

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF DELAWARE

EMPLOYERS INSURANCE COMPANY OF WAUSAU, HELMSMAN MANAGEMENT SERVICES, LLC, LIBERTY INSURANCE CORPORATION, LIBERTY MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, LM INSURANCE CORPORATION, THE FIRST LIBERTY INSURANCE CORPORATION, and WAUSAU UNDERWRITERS INSURANCE COMPANY,

Defendants-Below,
Appellants/Cross-Appellees,

v.

FIRST STATE ORTHOPAEDICS, P.A., on behalf of itself and all others similarly situated,

Plaintiff-Below, Appellee/Cross-Appellant.

No. 27, 2023

Appeal from the Superior Court of the State of Delaware,
C.A. No. S19C-01-051 CAK

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE AMICI CURIAE BRIEF

Pursuant to Delaware Supreme Court Rule 28, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America (the “Chamber”) and the Delaware State Chamber of Commerce (the “Delaware Chamber”) (collectively, “Movants”) request leave to file a brief as amici curiae in support of Cross-Appellees Employers Insurance Company of Wausau, Helmsman Management Services, LLC, Liberty Insurance Corporation, Liberty Mutual Fire Insurance Company, LM Insurance Corporation, The First Liberty Insurance Corporation, and Wausau Underwriters Insurance Company (“Liberty Mutual”) in the cross-appeal of First State Orthopaedics, P.A. (“FSO”) and in support of the affirmance of the Superior Court’s class certification decision below, and state as follows:

1. The Chamber is the world’s largest business federation. It represents approximately 300,000 direct members and indirectly represents the interests of more than three million companies and professional organizations.
2. The Delaware Chamber is the largest business organization in the state of Delaware. It serves as a unified voice for business with a mission to promote an economic climate that enables businesses of all sizes and types to become more competitive.
3. Movants represent those sharing a common interest in the stability, regularity, fairness, and predictability of civil litigation in ordering their business affairs.
4. FSO cross-appeals from the Superior Court’s finding that class certification was not appropriate under Rule 23(b)(2). As described in the proposed Amicus Curiae Brief, trial courts have broad discretion in making such determinations. This discretion is preserved in the text of Rule 23 itself and the case law interpreting it. The Rule and decades of case law recognize that trial courts must have the discretion to take into account practical considerations to ensure that the goals of the class action device—fairness and efficiency—are realized.

5. As to putative Rule 23(b)(2) classes, for which class treatment must be “appropriate,” courts have discretion to consider whether class treatment confers additional benefits to absent class members. For example, in many declaratory-relief-only putative class actions, absent class members receive the same benefit of the court’s declaration regardless of whether a class is certified. Many courts, including the Superior Court here, have properly evaluated this factor in determining that Rule 23(b)(2)’s “appropriateness” requirement is not met.

6. The proposed Amici Curiae Brief provides important context for this case by examining the development of case law interpreting trial court discretion in matters of class certification broadly, as well as discretion specifically as relates to the “appropriateness” of certification in (b)(2) cases. It further describes the market impact of reversing the Superior Court’s class certification decision. Such a reversal would be tantamount to stripping trial courts of their well-established and necessary discretion to decide the propriety of class certification. This would make Delaware a hotbed for declaratory-only-relief class actions that would not be certified elsewhere, and would be extremely disruptive to the national marketplace, given the number of business over which Delaware exercises personal jurisdiction and which often find themselves defendants in putative class actions.

7. The proposed Amici Curiae brief is less than 5,000 words, relates solely to the class certification decision that FSO has cross-appealed, and does not address the issues raised in Liberty Mutual's appeal.

8. Pursuant to Supreme Court Rule 28(b)(3), Movants inquired as to the positions of the parties. Liberty Mutual has consented to the motion. FSO has consented to this motion based on an agreement with Liberty Mutual under which Liberty Mutual will not oppose a forthcoming motion by FSO to extend by ten days the deadline to file its reply brief. Movants take no position with respect to FSO's proposal for additional time to file a reply brief.

9. For the foregoing reasons, the Movants request leave to file the Amici Curiae Brief attached as Exhibit A. For the Court's convenience, a compendium of all secondary sources cited in the proposed brief is attached as Exhibit B.

[SIGNATURE PAGE FOLLOWS.]

Dated: July 12, 2023

DUANE MORRIS LLP

/s/ Richard L. Renck

Richard L. Renck (#3893)
1201 N. Market Street, Suite 501
Wilmington, DE 19801
Telephone: (302) 657-4900
Facsimile: (302) 657-4901
RLRenck@duanemorris.com

OF COUNSEL:

Robert Palumbos
DUANE MORRIS LLP
30 South 17th Street
Philadelphia, PA 19103
RMPalumbos@duanemorris.com

Rebecca Bazan
DUANE MORRIS LLP
901 New York Avenue NW
Suite 700E
Washington, DC 20001
REBazan@duanemorris.com

Jennifer B. Dickey
Kevin R. Palmer*
U.S. Chamber of Commerce
1615 H Street, NW
Washington, DC 20062
JDickey@USChamber.com
KPalmer@USChamber.com

*Counsel for Movants the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America of the Delaware State
Chamber of Commerce*

*Admitted in Massachusetts only.
Practicing under the supervision of members of the D.C. Bar.

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF DELAWARE

EMPLOYERS INSURANCE COMPANY OF WAUSAU, HELMSMAN MANAGEMENT SERVICES, LLC, LIBERTY INSURANCE CORPORATION, LIBERTY MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, LM INSURANCE CORPORATION, THE FIRST LIBERTY INSURANCE CORPORATION, and WAUSAU UNDERWRITERS INSURANCE COMPANY,

Defendants-Below,
Appellants/Cross-Appellees,

v.

FIRST STATE ORTHOPAEDICS, P.A., on behalf of itself and all others similarly situated,

Plaintiff-Below, Appellee/Cross-Appellant.

No. 27, 2023

Appeal from the Superior Court of the State of Delaware,
C.A. No. S19C-01-051 CAK

CERTIFICATE OF COMPLIANCE WITH TYPEFACE REQUIREMENT AND TYPE-VOLUME LIMITATION

1. This motion complies with the typeface requirement of Rule 13(a)(1) because it has been prepared in Times New Roman 14-point typeface using Microsoft Word 2016.
2. This motion complies with the type-volume limitation of Supreme Court Rule 30(d) because it contains 638 words, which were counted by Microsoft Word 2016.

DUANE MORRIS LLP

OF COUNSEL:

Robert M. Palumbos
DUANE MORRIS LLP
30 South 17th Street
Philadelphia, PA 19103
RMPalumbos@duanemorris.com

Rebecca Bazan
DUANE MORRIS LLP
901 New York Avenue NW
Suite 700E
Washington, DC 20001
REBazan@duanemorris.com

Jennifer B. Dickey
Kevin R. Palmer*
U.S. Chamber of Commerce
1615 H Street, NW
Washington, DC 20062
JDickey@USChamber.com
KPalmer@USChamber.com

*Admitted in Massachusetts only.
Practicing under the supervision of members of the D.C. Bar.

/s/ Richard L. Renck

Richard L. Renck (#3893)
1201 N. Market Street, Suite 501
Wilmington, DE 19801
Telephone: (302) 657-4900
Facsimile: (302) 657-4901
rlrenck@duanemorris.com

*Counsel for Amici Curiae the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America and the Delaware State
Chamber of Commerce*

EFiled: Jul 12 2023 10:47AM EDT

Filing ID 70364214

Case Number 27,2023D

EXHIBIT A

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF DELAWARE

EMPLOYERS INSURANCE COMPANY OF WAUSAU, HELMSMAN MANAGEMENT SERVICES, LLC, LIBERTY INSURANCE CORPORATION, LIBERTY MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, LM INSURANCE CORPORATION, THE FIRST LIBERTY INSURANCE CORPORATION, and WAUSAU UNDERWRITERS INSURANCE COMPANY,

Defendants-Below,
Appellants/Cross-Appellees,

v.

FIRST STATE ORTHOPAEDICS, P.A., on behalf of itself and all others similarly situated,

Plaintiff-Below, Appellee/Cross-Appellant.

No. 27, 2023

Appeal from the Superior Court of the State of Delaware,
C.A. No. S19C-01-051 CAK

BRIEF OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE DELAWARE STATE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AS AMICI CURIAE SUPPORTING CROSS-APPELLEES AND AFFIRMANCE OF DENIAL OF CLASS CERTIFICATION

DUANE MORRIS LLP

OF COUNSEL:

Robert M. Palumbos
DUANE MORRIS LLP
30 South 17th Street
Philadelphia, PA 19103
RMPalumbos@duanemorris.com

Rebecca Bazan
DUANE MORRIS LLP
901 New York Avenue NW
Suite 700E
Washington, DC 20001
REBazan@duanemorris.com

Jennifer B. Dickey
Kevin R. Palmer*
U.S. Chamber of Commerce
1615 H Street, NW
Washington, DC 20062
JDickey@USChamber.com
KPalmer@USChamber.com

Richard L. Renck (#3893)
1201 N. Market Street, Suite 501
Wilmington, DE 19801
Telephone: (302) 657-4900
Facsimile: (302) 657-4901
rlrenck@duanemorris.com

*Counsel for Amici Curiae the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America and the Delaware State
Chamber of Commerce*

*Admitted in Massachusetts only.
Practicing under the supervision of members of the D.C. Bar.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
IDENTITY AND INTEREST OF AMICI.....	5
SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT	7
ARGUMENT.....	9
I. Superior Court Civil Rule 23 Preserves Discretion in Trial Courts to Decide Whether Certification of a Particular Class Action Would Be Appropriate.....	9
II. Whether Class Treatment Confers Additional Benefits is a Proper Consideration in the Rule 23(b)(2) Class Certification Analysis.	15
III. Stripping Delaware Trial Courts of Discretion to Consider Whether Certification Is Appropriate Could Make Delaware a Hotbed for Declaratory-Relief-Only Class Actions.	20
CONCLUSION.....	24

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Federal Cases

Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor , 521 U.S. 591 (1997).....	9
Brown v. Scott , 602 F.2d 791 (7th Cir. 1979).....	17
Califano v. Yamasaki , 442 U.S. 682 (1979).....	9, 11
China Agritech, Inc. v. Resh , 138 S. Ct. 1800 (2018).....	13
In re Deepwater Horizon , 713 F. App'x 360 (5th Cir. 2018).....	13
DiFrancesco v. Fox , 2019 WL 145627 (D. Mont. Jan. 9, 2019).....	17
Dionne v. Bouley , 757 F.2d 1344 (1st Cir. 1985).....	16, 18
Fish v. Kobach , 318 F.R.D. 450 (D. Kan. 2016).....	17
Galvan v. Levine , 490 F.2d 1255 (2d Cir. 1973).....	19
Gayle v. Warden Monmouth County Correctional Institution , 838 F.3d 297 (3d Cir. 2016).....	16, 18
Hill v. Snyder , 821 F.3d 763 (6th Cir. 2016).....	16
Johnson v. City of Opelousas , 658 F.2d 1065 (5th Cir. 1981).....	18
Kansas Health Care Ass'n v. Kansas Dep't of Soc. & Rehab. Servs. , 31 F.3d 1536 (10th Cir. 1994).....	16
Lowery v. Cir. City Stores , 158 F.3d 742 (4th Cir. 1998).....	11
Mills v. Dist. of Columbia , 266 F.R.D. 20 (D.D.C. 2010)	11
Mitchell-Tracey v. United Gen. Title Ins. Co. , 442 F. App'x 2 (4th Cir. 2011).....	13
Planned Parenthood of S. Atl. v. Baker , 2020 WL 1434946 (D.S.C. Mar. 23, 2020).....	17
Reiter v. Sonotone Corp. , 442 U.S. 330 (1979)	9
In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc. , 51 F.3d 1293 (7th Cir. 1995).....	11

Sandford v. R.L. Coleman Realty Co. , 573 F.2d 173 (4th Cir. 1978)	17
Shady Grove Orthopedic Associates v. Allstate Insurance Company , 559 U.S. 393 (2010).....	12-14
Shook v. El Paso Cnty. , 386 F.3d 963 (10th Cir. 2004).	11, 15
In re: Subway Footlong Sandwich Marketing and Sales Practices Litigation , 869 F.3d 551 (7th Cir. 2017).....	21-22
United Farmworkers of Fla. Hous. Project, Inc. v. City of Delray Beach , 493 F.2d 799 (5th Cir. 1974).....	17
In re Walgreen Co. Stockholder Litig. , 832 F.3d 718 (7th Cir. 2016).....	22
Watkins v. Simmons & Clark, Inc. , 618 F.2d 398 (6th Cir. 1980).....	20
Wilcox v. Com. Bank of Kansas City , 474 F.2d 336 (10th Cir. 1973).....	23
State Cases
Appriva S'holder Litig. Co. v. ev3, Inc. , 937 A.2d 1275 (Del. 2007)	9
Buttonwood Tree Value Partners, L.P. v. R. L. Polk & Co., Inc. , 2022 WL 2255258 (Del. Ch. June 23, 2022).....	9
In re Celera Corp. S'holder Litig. , 59 A.3d 418 (Del. 2012).....	15
First State Orthopaedics, P.A. v. Emps. Ins. Co. of Wausau , 2022 WL 18228287 (Del. Super. Ct. Dec. 29, 2022).....	10, 18-19
PaineWebber R&D Partners, L.P. v. Centocor, Inc. , 1997 WL 719096 (Del. Super. Ct. Oct. 9, 1997).....	12
Federal Rules of Court
Fed. R. Civ. P. 23.....	Passim
State Rules of Court
Del. Super. Ct. Civ. R. 23	10

Other Authorities

Delaware Division of Corporations, 2021 Annual Report , available at https://corpfiles.delaware.gov/Annual-Reports/Division-of-Corporations-2021-Annual-Report.pdf	20
May , MERRIAM-WEBSTER DICTIONARY, https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/may (last visited July 11, 2023).....	10
Must , MERRIAM-WEBSTER DICTIONARY, https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/must (last visited July 11, 2023).....	10
Tobias Barrington Wolff, Discretion in Class Certification , 162 U.P.A. L. REV. 1897, 1897-98 (2014).....	9
7AA Charles Alan Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 1785.2 (3d ed. updated Apr. 2023).....	12, 15

IDENTITY AND INTEREST OF AMICI

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America (the “Chamber”) is the world’s largest business federation. It represents approximately 300,000 direct members and indirectly represents the interests of more than three million companies and professional organizations of every size, in every industry sector, and from every region of the country. An important function of the Chamber is to represent the interests of its members before Congress, the Executive Branch, and the courts.

The Delaware State Chamber of Commerce (“Delaware Chamber”) is the largest business organization in the state of Delaware. The Delaware Chamber serves as a unified voice for business with a mission to promote an economic climate that enables businesses of all sizes and types to become more competitive in a constantly changing, increasingly global, and unpredictable environment.

To that end, the Chamber and Delaware Chamber (collectively the “Amici”) regularly file amicus curiae briefs in cases, like this one, that raise issues of concern to the nation’s business community. This case is of interest to the Amici because hundreds of thousands of businesses organized in the state, including members of the Amici, are or may become defendants in putative class actions. Members of the Amici and the broader business community have a vital interest in predictable and fair administration of the Superior Court Civil Rules related to class actions.

In this case, reversing the Superior Court’s denial of class certification under Superior Court Civil Rule 23(b)(2) would be tantamount to stripping trial courts of their well-established and necessary discretion to decide the propriety of class certification. Such a sea-change in class certification jurisprudence under Delaware law would be incredibly disruptive to the national marketplace, given the number of businesses over which Delaware exercises personal jurisdiction. It would also make Delaware a hotbed for declaratory-only-relief class actions that would not be certified elsewhere. The Court should uphold the Superior Court’s discretion to deny class certification in this case.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

1. Superior Court Civil Rule 23 preserves trial courts' discretion in deciding whether to certify putative class actions. The rule states that class actions "may" be maintained if certain criteria are met, not that such putative classes "must" be certified. Federal courts have interpreted the same language in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23 to mean that trial courts have the discretion to consider factors other than those listed in Rule 23 itself when determining whether class certification is appropriate. Given that Superior Court Civil Rule 23 is the "near twin" of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23, the Court should follow the federal Rule 23 decisions on this issue.

2. Federal courts applying the corollary to Superior Court Civil Rule 23 have consistently held that trial courts have the discretion to consider the potential impact (or lack thereof) of class-wide relief when determining whether certification is appropriate under Rule 23(b)(2). The Superior Court exercised precisely that discretion when it determined in this case that a class-wide declaratory judgment would provide no meaningful benefit beyond the declaration the court awarded to the named plaintiff and that class treatment was therefore inappropriate. The Court should affirm that decision as a proper exercise of the discretion preserved in Superior Court Civil Rule 23.

3. Reversal of the Superior Court’s certification decision in this case would effectively strip Delaware trial courts of their well-established discretion in class certification matters. That would, in turn, open the floodgates to putative, declaratory-only-relief class actions that would not be certified elsewhere. Delaware courts could be inundated by enterprising plaintiffs filing class actions against companies seeking declaratory relief each time they disagree with a company policy, because they would be virtually guaranteed class certification, regardless of whether class treatment would provide any meaningful benefit. This policy consideration buttresses the existing precedent interpreting Rule 23.

ARGUMENT

I. Superior Court Civil Rule 23 Preserves Discretion in Trial Courts to Decide Whether Certification of a Particular Class Action Would Be Appropriate.

The proposition that a trial “court has broad discretion in deciding whether a suit may be maintained as a class action” “has repeatedly been embraced by the [United States] Supreme Court as a necessary starting point when interpreting and applying [Rule 23] in modern practice.” Tobias Barrington Wolff, Discretion in Class Certification, 162 U. PA. L. REV. 1897, 1897-98 (2014).¹ It has similarly been embraced by Delaware courts, e.g., Buttonwood Tree Value Partners, L.P. v. R. L. Polk & Co., Inc., 2022 WL 2255258, at *3 (Del. Ch. June 23, 2022), which look to cases interpreting the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure as persuasive authority when analyzing their state counterparts. Appriva S'holder Litig. Co. v. ev3, Inc., 937 A.2d 1275, 1286 (Del. 2007).

The trial court’s discretion to determine the propriety of class certification is memorialized in the rule itself. Superior Court Civil Rule 23 states that “[o]ne or more members of a class may sue . . . as representative parties” and that “[a]n action may be maintained as a class action” if Rule 23(a) and one of the prongs of Rule 23(b) are satisfied. Del. Super. Ct. Civ. R. 23 (emphases added). The federal analogue uses the same discretionary “may” language. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23. “May” does not mean “must.” “May” is “used to indicate possibility or probability” and does not command a particular outcome. May, MERRIAM-WEBSTER DICTIONARY, <https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/may> (last visited July 11, 2023); see Must, MERRIAM-WEBSTER DICTIONARY, <https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/must> (last visited July 11, 2023).

¹ See, e.g., Califano v. Yamasaki, 442 U.S. 682, 703 (1979) (“[M]ost issues arising under Rule 23 [are] committed in the first instance to the discretion of the district court.”); Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., 442 U.S. 330, 345 (1979) (explaining that district courts have “broad power and discretion . . . with respect to matters involving the certification” of class actions); Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 630 (1997) (Breyer, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“The law gives broad leeway to district courts in making class certification decisions”).

Federal courts applying Rule 23 have recognized that trial courts have discretion that is broader than what the Superior Court exercised in this case. While the Superior Court here denied certification because the Rule 23(b)(2) requirements were not met,² federal courts have interpreted the “may” language of Rule 23 to mean that trial courts have discretion to deny class certification, even when the listed requirements are met, if other factors make certification inappropriate. For example, the Fourth Circuit has found:

Rule 23 states that an action “may” be maintained as a class action if the listed requirements are met. The Rule does not say that, once the requirements are met, the district court “must” certify and maintain the suit as a class action. ... [W]e have previously held that district courts have broad discretion in deciding whether to certify a class. This broad discretion necessarily implies that the district court may appropriately consider factors other than those listed in Rule 23 in determining whether to certify a class action If ... other factors exist that militate against trying the case as a class action, it is appropriate for the district court to decertify the class. ... [T]he district court has such broad discretion to certify a class because it is intimately familiar with such practical and factual intricacies of the suit.

² First State Orthopaedics, P.A. v. Emps. Ins. Co. of Wausau, 2022 WL 18228287, at *3-4 (Del. Super. Ct. Dec. 29, 2022).

Lowery v. Cir. City Stores, 158 F.3d 742, 757-58 (4th Cir. 1998), vacated, 527 U.S. 1031 (1999), aff'd in pertinent part, 206 F.3d 431 (4th Cir. 2000) (internal citations omitted).

“The substance of the Lowery court’s interpretation ... represents the dominant sentiment among the lower federal courts throughout the post-1966 period.” Wolff, supra, at 1936; see, e.g., Yamasaki, 442 U.S. at 702 (recognizing trial court authority to consider grounds not specified in Rule 23, including systemic impact, in deciding how to exercise its discretion on class certification); Shook v. El Paso Cnty., 386 F.3d 963, 973 (10th Cir. 2004) (“We agree with the Lowery court” that considerations not expressly addressed in Rule 23 “are not categorically precluded in determining whether to certify a 23(b)(2) class.”); In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc., 51 F.3d 1293, 1298-1304 (7th Cir. 1995) (analyzing potential impact of class certification on shared social policies as a basis to decertify a class); Mills v. Dist. of Columbia, 266 F.R.D. 20, 22 (D.D.C. 2010) (“Even though the proposed classes satisfy the eligibility criteria in Rule 23, the Court may nevertheless deny class certification based on other relevant considerations,” including “factors not expressly delineated in Rule 23.”); see also 7AA Charles Alan Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 1785.2 (3d ed. updated Apr. 2023) (“[I]n exercising its discretion to certify a class action, the court may take account of considerations not expressly dealt with in Rule 23.”). And because Superior Court Civil Rule 23 “is the near twin of the well-established … Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23, it stands to reason that case law interpreting those rules will apply with equal force here.” PaineWebber R&D Partners, L.P. v. Centocor, Inc., 1997 WL 719096, at *4 (Del. Super. Ct. Oct. 9, 1997).

Amicus curiae Public Citizen argues that this Court should read the “may” out of Rule 23. Relying on Shady Grove Orthopedic Associates v. Allstate Insurance Company, 559 U.S. 393 (2010), it argues that “[t]he use of the word ‘may’ ‘confer[s] categorical permission’ for the plaintiff to bring a class action.” (Brief for Public Citizen as Amicus Curiae Supporting Plaintiff-Cross-Appellant (“Public Citizen Brief”) at 7 (second alteration in original).) On this view, the Court should interpret “may” to mean “must,” such that any time the Rule 23(a) and (b) factors are satisfied, a trial court has no discretion to deny class certification.

While Shady Grove is irrelevant because the Superior Court here found that Rule 23(b)(2) was not satisfied, Public Citizen also reads far too much into Shady Grove. The U.S. Supreme Court subsequently made clear that Shady Grove does not require that suits must proceed as class actions whenever they “meet[] the requirements of Rule 23(a) and (b).” China Agritech, Inc. v. Resh, 138 S. Ct. 1800, 1809 (2018). As the Court explained, Shady Grove’s holding is limited to the particular situation that case presented, “in which a Rule 23 class action could have been maintained absent a contrary state-law command.” Id. (citation omitted). The focus of Shady Grove was whether a state law could statutorily limit the availability of class actions in federal diversity cases when class certification would have been appropriate under Rule 23. Shady Grove did not up-end trial courts’ well-established discretion on matters of class certification, and did not convert the term “may” into “must.”

Indeed, “[i]n the years since the Court decided Shady Grove, the lower federal courts have treated the case almost exclusively as a Rules Enabling Act decision and have given it little attention in the class certification analysis.” Wolff, supra, at 1950. Multiple federal circuit courts have declined to hold that Shady Grove “creat[es] an absolute entitlement to proceed with a class action lawsuit” if the requirements of Rule 23 are met. Mitchell-Tracey v. United Gen. Title Ins. Co., 442 F. App’x 2, 6 (4th Cir. 2011); In re Deepwater Horizon, 713 F. App’x 360, 362-63 (5th Cir. 2018) (holding that Shady Grove did not give plaintiffs whose suits meet Rule 23 the “absolute right to file … class claims”). And no Delaware state court has relied on Shady Grove to hold that trial courts lack discretion to decline to certify classes that meet the Rule 23 requirements.

“[D]iscretion in class certification—in particular, the discretion not to certify a class even though the threshold requirements of the Rule appear to be satisfied—serves a vital systemic role.” Wolff, supra, at 1899. That discretion operates as a “safety valve” that enables courts “to avoid issuing certification orders that would undermine substantive policies or set in motion unnecessary and counterproductive remedies.” Id. This discretion has been recognized in state and federal decisions analyzing Rule 23, and Shady Grove did not destroy it.

II. Whether Class Treatment Confers Additional Benefits is a Proper Consideration in the Rule 23(b)(2) Class Certification Analysis.

Class actions are founded on the “[e]quitable notions of fairness and efficiency.” In re Celera Corp. S’holder Litig., 59 A.3d 418, 434 (Del. 2012). As a result, “[t]he vehicle of class action litigation must ultimately satisfy practical as well as purely legal considerations.” Shook, 386 F.3d at 973. The discretion recognized by Rule 23 permits trial courts to weigh such pragmatic factors as part of the class certification analysis.

One practical consideration that trial courts have discretion to weigh is whether class-wide relief would confer any additional benefit beyond individual relief. This factor is especially relevant in putative class actions under Rule 23(b)(2) that seek only declaratory or injunctive relief because absent class members have no opportunity to opt out of having their claims adjudicated. It is a weighty decision for a court to bind absent class members in such circumstances, and a court can properly consider the utility in doing so before taking that step. A court’s declaration, for example, has value to parties and non-parties alike, and injunctive relief prohibiting or commanding that a defendant take particular actions can benefit all who interact with the defendant. Accordingly, “the vast majority of courts” accept that the specific need for class relief in a particular case is “an appropriate consideration when certifying a Rule 23(b)(2) action.” 7AA Charles Alan Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 1785.2 (3d ed. updated Apr. 2023).

For example, in Gayle v. Warden Monmouth County Correctional Institution, 838 F.3d 297, 310 (3d Cir. 2016), the Third Circuit held that necessity “may be considered to the extent it is relevant to the enumerated Rule 23 criteria,” including the requirement that the declaratory or injunctive relief be “appropriate.” It recognized that there “may be circumstances where class certification is not appropriate because in view of the declaratory … relief ordered on an individual basis, there would be no meaningful additional benefit to prospective class members in ordering classwide relief.” Id.

Other federal courts have similarly held that it is proper to consider the potential impact (or lack thereof) of certification on the relief available to absent class members when determining whether class-wide relief is “appropriate” under federal Rule 23(b)(2). See Hill v. Snyder, 821 F.3d 763, 771 (6th Cir. 2016) (“[T]he district court should []consider whether class certification [is] necessary and appropriate in this case”); Kansas Health Care Ass’n v. Kansas Dep’t of Soc. & Rehab. Servs., 31 F.3d 1536, 1548 (10th Cir. 1994) (affirming denial of class certification because “class certification is unnecessary if all the class members will benefit from an injunction issued on behalf of the named plaintiffs” (internal quotation mark and citation omitted)); Dionne v. Bouley, 757 F.2d 1344, 1356 (1st Cir. 1985) (“[W]hen the same relief can be obtained without certifying a class, a court may be justified in concluding that class relief is not ‘appropriate.’” (internal citation omitted)); United Farmworkers of Fla. Hous. Project, Inc. v. City of Delray Beach, 493 F.2d 799, 812 (5th Cir. 1974) (affirming district court’s refusal to certify a class where “the requested injunctive and declaratory relief will benefit not only the individual appellants … but all other persons subject to the practice under attack” (citations omitted)).³

That trial courts have discretion to consider whether class certification confers any additional benefit does not “effectively eliminate Rule 23(b)(2)’s reference to appropriate declaratory relief,” as argued by Public Citizen. (Public Citizen Brief at 2.) A trial court can always consider the potential benefits of a declaratory relief class and determine that class treatment is “appropriate.”

For example, class certification may be appropriate in a declaratory-relief-only class if there is a significant risk that the named plaintiff’s case may become moot during the pendency of the litigation, imperiling the rights of unnamed class members with live claims. If the class is certified, the case can continue on with the substitution of a new named plaintiff. If, however, the class is not certified, then the case ends with the mooting of the individual plaintiff's case. Courts often recognize potential mootness of the named plaintiff's case as a reason why (b)(2) certification may be appropriate. E.g., Dionne, 757 F.2d at 1356 (recognizing that (b)(2) certification may be appropriate when the individual claim might become moot); Gayle, 838 F.3d at 312 (same); Johnson v. City of Opelousas, 658 F.2d 1065, 1070 (5th Cir. 1981) (same). It is precisely because of these case-specific circumstances that trial courts have (and need) the discretion to consider the propriety of class certification.

³ See also Planned Parenthood of S. Atl. v. Baker, 2020 WL 1434946, at *4 (D.S.C. Mar. 23, 2020) (denying motion for class certification because “relief from the individual case would ‘have the same purpose and effect as a class action’” (quoting Sandford v. R.L. Coleman Realty Co., 573 F.2d 173, 178 n.9 (4th Cir. 1978))); DiFrancesco v. Fox, 2019 WL 145627, at *3 (D. Mont. Jan. 9, 2019) (holding that because “[n]o useful need or purpose is served by certification,” “[c]lass certification is inappropriate and unnecessary”); Fish v. Kobach, 318 F.R.D. 450, 454-57 (D. Kan. 2016) (denying class certification because the relief would flow to all potential class members and the benefits of certification were slight compared with the burdens). The Seventh Circuit is the outlier federal circuit in holding that class certification should not be refused because of lack of need. Brown v. Scott, 602 F.2d 791, 795 (7th Cir. 1979).

The Superior Court properly weighed the practical considerations and specific circumstances of this case in its class certification analysis. Plaintiffs sought only declaratory relief regarding an explanation of benefits code that Defendants stopped using before this case began. First State Orthopaedics, 2022 WL 18228287, at *1, 4. The Superior Court ruled on the merits, declaring that the code did not comply with the Delaware Worker's Compensation Law simultaneously with its class certification decision. Id. at *10. That decision "binds the parties" and "bind[s] Defendants even [though] no class [wa]s certified." Id. at *3-4. Defendants also signaled that they had no intention of reinstating their use of the code by offering "to enter a consent judgment that would prevent them from using [the code] in the future.” Id. at *7. Exercising its discretion under Rule 23 to consider such practical factors, the court found under that these circumstances, class certification was not appropriate under Rule 23(b)(2). Id. at *3-4.

The Superior Court’s decision is analogous to the decision in Galvan v. Levine, 490 F.2d 1255 (2d Cir. 1973). There, the Second Circuit affirmed the denial of class certification under Rule 23(b)(2) in a case challenging an allegedly discriminatory policy. Id. at 1257, 1262. The court held that the district court’s judgment ran “to the benefit not only of the named plaintiffs but of all others similarly situated”; the defendant “ha[d] made clear that it understands the judgment to bind it with respect to all claimants”; and the defendant “withdrew the challenged policy” before the entry of judgment and “stated it did not intend to reinstate the policy.” Id. at 1261 (citations omitted). For the same reasons, the Superior Court’s decision to deny class certification here was well within the scope of its discretion under Rule 23.

Rule 23 preserves the discretion of trial courts considering how to handle representative litigation. Under longstanding precedent, this discretion includes the ability to weigh practical considerations, such as whether class-wide relief would confer meaningful benefit beyond individual relief. Because the Superior Court’s decision falls within the heartland of both principles, the Court should affirm.

III. Stripping Delaware Trial Courts of Discretion to Consider Whether Certification Is Appropriate Could Make Delaware a Hotbed for Declaratory-Relief-Only Class Actions.

Reversing the Superior Court’s certification decision would “effectively negate the discretion of a [trial] court to certify a class” in Delaware. Watkins v. Simmons & Clark, Inc., 618 F.2d 398, 404 (6th Cir. 1980). If the trial court could not exercise its discretion to decline certification in this case—where the only relief sought was declaratory, the offending conduct ended before the case began, and the court entered a declaration that bound the defendant—one wonders what circumstances would permit a court to do so.

A decision effectively revoking the discretion of Delaware trial courts to consider whether class treatment is necessary and appropriate risks a tidal wave of declaratory-relief class actions. Any plaintiff dissatisfied with a policy of a company incorporated in Delaware could conceivably initiate a declaratory-relief-only class action in a Delaware trial court challenging the policy. Without the safety valve of trial court discretion to deny class certification, plaintiffs in such cases would be virtually guaranteed class certification and its associated trappings. Not only would that result unduly burden Delaware courts, it would be disruptive to the two-thirds of Fortune 500 companies that are incorporated in Delaware and subject to personal jurisdiction in the state. See Delaware Division of Corporations, 2021 Annual Report, available at <https://corpfiles.delaware.gov/Annual-Reports/Division-of> Corporations-2021-Annual-Report.pdf.

Among the incentives to bring such suits is the potential for awards of attorneys' fees. As both First State Orthopaedics, P.A. and its amicus Public Citizen recognize, the prospect of attorneys' fees in class actions is a driver of such suits. (Appellee/Cross-Appellant Br. at 39-41; Public Citizen Brief at 20.) While there are certainly class actions certified under Rule 23(b)(2) that result in appreciable benefits for the class beyond what would have been provided by an individual judgment, there are many others (like this case) in which class-wide relief would provide no additional benefit to any person other than the plaintiffs' attorney. Among the reasons that it is appropriate for courts to consider this factor as part of class certification decisions is to avoid the prospect of attorneys' fees where counsel has provided no meaningful benefit to class members.

The Seventh Circuit's decision in In re: Subway Footlong Sandwich Marketing and Sales Practices Litigation, 869 F.3d 551 (7th Cir. 2017), provides a good example of a court's use of Rule 23 to avert this problem. Plaintiffs sued under state consumer protection laws, seeking damages, injunctive relief, and class certification because Subway's "Footlong sandwich" was only eleven inches long. Id. at 552, 554. The parties reached a class settlement pursuant to Rule 23(b)(2), under which "Subway agreed to implement certain measures to ensure, to the extent practicable, that all Footlong sandwiches are at least 12 inches long," but the settlement acknowledged that “even with these measures in place, some sandwich rolls will inevitably fall short due to the natural variability in the baking process.” Id. at 553. The proposed settlement included hundreds of thousands of dollars for class counsel. Id. After the district court approved the class settlement, the Seventh Circuit reversed because class relief did “not benefit the class in any meaningful way.” Id. at 557. Rather, because the class settlement benefited only class counsel by way of attorneys’ fees, the court held “the class should not have been certified and the settlement should not have been approved.” Id. (citation omitted). As the court summarized, a class action that does not provide meaningful benefits for the class and “yields [only] fees for class counsel” is ‘no better than a racket’ and ‘should be dismissed out of hand.’” Id. at 553 (alteration in original) (quoting In re Walgreen Co. Stockholder Litig., 832 F.3d 718, 724 (7th Cir. 2016)).

Reversing the Superior Court’s certification decision would invite many more such cases in Delaware. Class counsel could file declaratory-relief-only class actions, including demands for attorneys’ fees, and Delaware courts would have no discretion to consider the benefits of certification in the given circumstances. That is not—and should not be—the law. Rule 23 and the case law applying it give trial courts the discretion to deny class certification in putative (b)(2) cases when they deem class treatment inappropriate because it would provide no meaningful benefit. The Court should reject the invitation to deprive Delaware trial courts of their ability to weigh such practical considerations to arrive at sensible results. “It would be worse in the long run to maim or kill … Rule [23] with universal but improvident kindness than to limit on a case by case basis within sound judicial discretion its application to situations offering sensible results.” Wilcox v. Com. Bank of Kansas City, 474 F.2d 336, 349 (10th Cir. 1973).

[SIGNATURE PAGE FOLLOWS.]

CONCLUSION

For the forgoing reasons, the Chamber urges the Court to affirm the Superior Court's decision denying class certification.

Respectfully Submitted,

DUANE MORRIS LLP

OF COUNSEL:
Robert M. Palumbos
DUANE MORRIS LLP
30 South 17th Street
Philadelphia, PA 19103
RMPalumbos@duanemorris.com

Rebecca Bazan
DUANE MORRIS LLP
901 New York Avenue NW
Suite 700E
Washington, DC 20001
REBazan@duanemorris.com

Jennifer B. Dickey
Kevin R. Palmer*
U.S. Chamber of Commerce
1615 H Street, NW
Washington, DC 20062
JDickey@USChamber.com
KPalmier@USChamber.com

*Admitted in Massachusetts only.
Practicing under the supervision of members of the D.C. Bar.

/s/ Richard L. Renck

Richard L. Renck (#3893)
1201 N. Market Street, Suite 501
Wilmington, DE 19801
Telephone: (302) 657-4900
Facsimile: (302) 657-4901
RLRenck@duanemorris.com

*Counsel for Amici Curiae the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America and the Delaware State
Chamber of Commerce*

WORD COUNT: 4,102

CERTIFICATE OF COMPLIANCE UNDER RULE 13(d)(ii)

Counsel for Amici Curiae the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America and the Delaware State Chamber of Commerce hereby certifies:

1. This brief complies with the typeface requirement of Rule 13(a)(1) because it has been prepared in Times New Roman 14-point typeface using Microsoft Word 2016.
2. This brief complies with the type-volume limitations of Rule 14(d)(1) and Rule 28(d) because it contains 4,102 words, which were counted in Microsoft Word 2016.

Dated: July 12, 2023

DUANE MORRIS LLP

/s/ Richard L. Renck

Richard L. Renck (#3893)
1201 N. Market Street, Suite 501
Wilmington, DE 19801
Telephone: (302) 657-4900
Facsimile: (302) 657-4901
RLRenck@duanemorris.com

Counsel for Amici Curiae the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America and the Delaware State Chamber of Commerce

EFiled: Jul 12 2023 10:47AM EDT

Filing ID 70364214

Case Number 27,2023D

EXHIBIT B

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF DELAWARE

EMPLOYERS INSURANCE COMPANY OF WAUSAU, HELMSMAN MANAGEMENT SERVICES, LLC, LIBERTY INSURANCE CORPORATION, LIBERTY MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, LM INSURANCE CORPORATION, THE FIRST LIBERTY INSURANCE CORPORATION, and WAUSAU UNDERWRITERS INSURANCE COMPANY,

Defendants-Below,
Appellants/Cross-Appellees,

v.

FIRST STATE ORTHOPAEDICS, P.A., on behalf of itself and all others similarly situated,

Plaintiff-Below, Appellee/Cross-Appellant.

No. 27, 2023

Appeal from the Superior Court of the State of Delaware,
C.A. No. S19C-01-051 CAK

COMPENDIUM OF SECONDARY SOURCES CITED IN THE BRIEF OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE DELAWARE STATE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AS AMICI CURIAE SUPPORTING CROSS-APPELLEES AND AFFIRMANCE OF DENIAL OF CLASS CERTIFICATION

DUANE MORRIS LLP

OF COUNSEL:

Robert M. Palumbos
DUANE MORRIS LLP
30 South 17th Street
Philadelphia, PA 19103
RMPalumbos@duanemorris.com

Rebecca Bazan
DUANE MORRIS LLP
901 New York Avenue NW
Suite 700E
Washington, DC 20001
REBazan@duanemorris.com

Jennifer B. Dickey
Kevin R. Palmer*
U.S. Chamber of Commerce
1615 H Street, NW
Washington, DC 20062
JDickey@USChamber.com
KPalmer@USChamber.com

*Admitted in Massachusetts only.
Practicing under the supervision of members of the D.C. Bar.

Richard L. Renck (#3893)
1201 N. Market Street, Suite 501
Wilmington, DE 19801
Telephone: (302) 657-4900
Facsimile: (302) 657-4901
rlrenck@duanemorris.com

*Counsel for Amici Curiae the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America and the Delaware State
Chamber of Commerce*

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Delaware Division of Corporations, 2021 Annual Report , available at https://corpfiles.delaware.gov/Annual-Reports/Division-of-Corporations-2021-Annual-Report.pdf	1
May , MERRIAM-WEBSTER DICTIONARY, https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/may (last visited July 11, 2023).....	4
Must , MERRIAM-WEBSTER DICTIONARY, https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/must (last visited July 11, 2023).....	5
Tobias Barrington Wolff, Discretion in Class Certification , 162 U.P.A. L. REV. 1897, 1897-98 (2014).....	6
7AA Charles Alan Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 1785.2 (3d ed. updated Apr. 2023).....	63

Delaware Division of Corporations: 2021 Annual Report

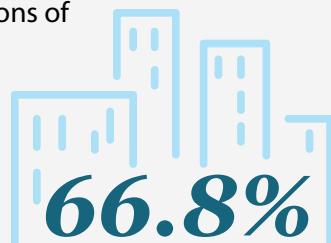

A Message from the Secretary of State Jeffrey W. Bullock

As the First State recovers from the COVID-19 pandemic, Delaware's Corporate Franchise continues to experience unprecedented growth.

In 2021, we added more than 336,407 business entities throughout the franchise. Total business entities topped 1.8 million at year-end with 36.9 percent growth in new formations of LLCs and 20.8 percent in the number of new corporations added.

Consistent with past years, the First State continues to be the domicile of choice for members of the Fortune 500 at nearly 66.8 percent.

Approximately 93 percent of all U.S. initial public offerings in the calendar year 2021 were registered in Delaware.

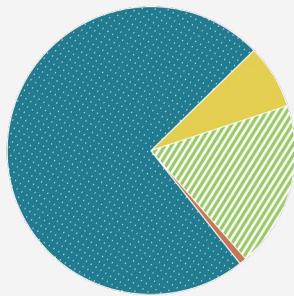

Percent of all Fortune 500 companies are incorporated in Delaware

Business owners and investors have the discretion to select any jurisdiction as their legal home for their business entity. However, they consistently choose Delaware for four main reasons:

1. Delaware's General Corporation Law is widely regarded as the most advanced and flexible business formation statute in the nation.
2. The Court of Chancery is a unique, centuries-old business court that has written most of the modern U.S. corporation case law.
3. Delaware's corporate and legal services community has unparalleled expertise in the application of Delaware Corporate Law and receives strong, bipartisan support from the Delaware General Assembly and our Governor for its efforts to continuously improve the state's laws.
4. The Delaware Division of Corporations provides prompt, friendly, and professional service and strives to continually improve based on what we hear from our customers.

Total Business Entity Formations in 2021

- 73.4% LLCs (247,003)
- 18.6% Corporations (62,510)
- 7.3% LPs/LLPs (24,588)
- 0.7% Statutory Trust (2,306)

2020

- 72.3% LLCs (180,376)
- 20.7% Corporations (51,747)
- 6.2% LPs/LLPs (15,348)
- 0.8% Statutory Trust (1,956)

2019

- 73.2% LLCs (165,910)
- 20.0% Corporations (45,405)
- 6.0% LPs/LLPs (13,513)
- 0.8% Statutory Trust (1,761)

Business Entity Formations CY 2019–2021 Totals

	2019 CY	2020 CY	2021 CY
LLCs	165,910	180,376	247,003
Corporations	45,405	51,747	62,510
LPs/LLPs	13,513	15,348	24,588
Statutory Trusts	1,761	1,956	2,306
Totals	226,589	249,427	336,407

To continue making Delaware the premiere destination to incorporate, it's important to ensure that our laws are optimal for engaging in ethical and profitable business. During my term as Delaware's Secretary of State, I have served on the National Association of Secretaries of States' Executive Board several times.

I have also chaired the organization's Business Services Committee—the committee that spearheads initiatives on best state practices regarding corporate registrations, electronic business filings, and other related services—in an effort to lead in the development of common-sense regulations at the federal and state levels.

Total Number of Entities in Delaware

	2019 CY	2020 CY	2021 CY
LLCs	1,035,872	1,109,736	1,291,911
Corporations	325,174	336,270	370,404
LPs/LLPs	109,176	117,430	137,188
Statutory Trusts	22,763	23,829	25,547
Total Business Entities	1,492,985	1,587,265	1,825,050

Division of Corporations General Fund Revenue

	2019 FY	2020 FY	2021 FY
Net Business Entity Taxes	1,228.2	1,302.8	1,467.8
Business Entity Fees	123.0	127.0	148.3
UCC Fees	25.2	25.6	26.7
Total Revenue	1,376.4	1,455.4	1,642.8

Total Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) Transactions CY 2019 - 2021

	2019 CY	2020 CY	2021 CY
UCC 1	133,187	128,104	151,103
UCC 3	147,419	144,073	168,124
Searches	249,263	247,459	313,459
Total Transactions	529,869	519,636	632,686

It has been my honor and privilege these past 13 years as Secretary of State to be able to promote the great state of Delaware in many ways, including domestically and abroad. You have my commitment to maintaining this long tradition of ensuring that the Division of Corporations works hard every day to meet the needs of our customers as well as provide them with the best experience possible.

Sincerely,
Jeffrey W. Bullock

Jeffrey W. Bullock serves as the 80th Secretary of State and oversees the nearly two dozen agencies, including the Division of Corporations, at the Delaware Department of State.

mayXDictionaryThesaurus may 1 of 3 auxiliary verb

'mā past might ('mīt) ; present singular and plural may

1 a → used to indicate possibility or probability you may be right things you may need

→ sometimes used interchangeably with can one of those slipups that may happen from time to time

— Jessica Mitford

→ sometimes used where might would be expected you may think from a little distance that the country was solid woods

— Robert Frost

b : have permission to you may go now

: be free to a rug on which children may sprawl

— C. E. Silberman

→ used nearly interchangeably with can c archaic : have the ability to 2 → used in auxiliary function expressing purpose or expectation

mustXDictionaryThesaurus must 1 of 4 verb

məs(t), 'məst present tense and past tense, all persons must Synonyms of must >

auxiliary verb

1 a : be commanded or requested to you must stop

b : be urged to : ought by all means to you must read that book

2 : be compelled by physical necessity to one must eat to live

: be required by immediate or future need or purpose to

we must hurry to catch the bus

3 a : be obliged to : be compelled by social considerations to

I must say you're looking well

b : be required by law, custom, or moral conscience (see CONSCIENCE sense 1) to we must obey the rules

c : be determined to

if you must go at least wait for me d : be unreasonably or perversely compelled to why must you argue

University of Pennsylvania Carey Law School

Penn Carey Law: Legal Scholarship Repository

Faculty Scholarship at Penn Carey Law

2014

Discretion in Class Certification

Tobias Barrington Wolff

University of Pennsylvania Carey Law School

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarship.law.upenn.edu/faculty_scholarship

 Part of the Civil Procedure Commons, Courts Commons, Jurisprudence Commons, Legal History Commons, Litigation Commons, and the Public Law and Legal Theory Commons

Repository Citation

Wolff, Tobias Barrington, "Discretion in Class Certification" (2014). Faculty Scholarship at Penn Carey Law. 1389.

https://scholarship.law.upenn.edu/faculty_scholarship/1389

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by Penn Carey Law: Legal Scholarship Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in Faculty Scholarship at Penn Carey Law by an authorized administrator of Penn Carey Law: Legal Scholarship Repository. For more information, please contact PennlawIR@law.upenn.edu.

ARTICLE

DISCRETION IN CLASS CERTIFICATION

TOBIAS BARRINGTON WOLFF[†]

INTRODUCTION	1897
I. THE ABUSE OF DISCRETION STANDARD IN CLASS CERTIFICATION	1901
II. AN OVERVIEW OF DISCRETION UNDER MODERN RULE 23	1911
A. The Period of Transition Following the 1966 Revisions and Experimentation in the Face of Uncertainty	1911
B. Management of Class Proceedings	1916
C. Redefinition of the Class	1918
D. Discretion Not to Certify	1926
III. ANALYZING THE ROLE OF DISCRETION IN CLASS ACTION LITIGATION.....	1939
A. The System of Discretion Surrounding Class Certification	1940
B. Discretion in Class Certification After Shady Grove	1946
CONCLUSION.....	1951

INTRODUCTION

A district court has broad discretion in deciding whether a suit may be maintained as a class action. Variations on this phrase populate the class action jurisprudence of the federal courts. The sentiment reflects the equity roots of the representative class proceeding—a history that has been thoroughly investigated by leading scholars in the field of civil procedure,¹ structured the work of the committee that drafted modern Rule 23,² and has repeatedly been embraced by the Supreme Court as a necessary starting point when interpreting and applying the Rule in modern practice.³ The power of the federal courts to exercise discretion when deciding whether to permit a suit to proceed as a class action has long been treated as an elemental component of a representative proceeding. It is therefore cause for surprise that there is no broad consensus regarding the nature and definition of this judicial discretion in the certification process. The federal courts have not coalesced around a clear or thorough exposition of the question, and the scholarly literature has not provided a sustained analytical treatment.

[†] Professor of Law, University of Pennsylvania Law School. As ever, my work has benefited from the generous input of brilliant colleagues. I owe much to Steve Burbank, Sam Issacharoff, Anthony Scirica, and David Shapiro. Equally important are the contributions of Sydney Scott, Penn Law Class of 2013, who undertook a daunting project with persistence and extraordinary skill and produced the initial research file upon which the body of this Article was constructed.

Since the adoption of the 1966 amendments to Rule 23, lower federal courts have regularly exercised discretion in a range of modes when presented with requests for class certification. The management of class proceedings is perhaps the most widely acknowledged form of this discretion. The authority of district courts to make judgments about how to structure a complex proceeding—and to decide whether practical obstacles to the fair and accurate adjudication of claims on a class-wide basis make certification inappropriate—is a familiar one that enjoys an explicit textual foundation in Rule 23(b)(3) proceedings.⁴ Similarly, district courts sometimes exercise discretion in defining the parameters of the class definition and deciding when subclasses are necessary, often acting independently of any proposals made by the parties.⁵ And district courts—frequently acting with the imprimatur of the courts of appeals—have invoked a broad range of considerations to decide when class certification is desirable, appropriate, or

¹ See generally STEPHEN C. YEAZELL, FROM MEDIEVAL GROUP LITIGATION TO THE MODERN CLASS ACTION (1987) (tracing the roots of the class action device); Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr. et al., An Historical Analysis of the Binding Effect of Class Suits, 146 U. PA. L. REV. 1849, 1858-61 (1998) (examining the device's English antecedents).

² See Benjamin Kaplan, Continuing Work of the Civil Committee: 1966 Amendments of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (I), 81 HARV. L. REV. 356, 375-80 (1967) (discussing the equity roots of the class action provision revised and expanded in the 1966 amendments).

³ See Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corp., 527 U.S. 815, 832-41 (1999) (surveying the use of class actions in state equity courts predating the Rules Enabling Act); see also Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 613 (1997) ("Rule 23, governing federal-court class actions, stems from equity practice and gained its current shape in an innovative 1966 revision.").

⁴ See FED. R. CIV. P. 23(b)(3)(D) (requiring that a district court consider "the likely difficulties in managing a class action" in deciding whether to authorize certification of (b)(3) class actions).

⁵ The authority to make judgments on such matters is also made clear in the Rule, though the textual basis for considering them sua sponte is more debatable. See FED. R. CIV. P. 23(c)(1)(B) (requiring definition of the class for certification); FED. R. CIV. P. 23(c)(5) (permitting the creation of subclasses).

consistent with the underlying substantive law that governs the disputes brought before them. In (b)(3) proceedings, these determinations are often explained as an application of the superiority requirement, and in (b)(2) actions they are sometimes described in terms of the prerequisites for injunctive relief. However, lower courts have also found these forms of discretion to be inherent in Rule 23, requiring judges to consider the impact of substantive law on the certification question without regard to any specific textual mandate.⁶

Three propositions have infused this practice of discretionary class certification. The first is an understanding among judges that the modern class action entails an element of public trust. When a plaintiff comes into court asking to prosecute the claims of numerous people she has never met, she is not asserting a purely personal prerogative. Rather, the plaintiff is requesting that the court employ its authority to initiate a type of proceeding that must be justified with reference to broader public values: the procedural and systemic values embodied in Rule 23 itself, and the policies of the underlying law governing the dispute. Second, class actions entail substantial uncertainty. The question whether claims can be faithfully adjudicated and successfully managed on a classwide basis is often difficult to predict at the inception of a proceeding. And third, this combination of broad public interests and factual indeterminacy sometimes calls for experimentation as courts test the capacity of the class action to facilitate the “just, speedy, and inexpensive” resolution of mass claims.⁷

Because of these realities, discretion in class certification—in particular, the discretion not to certify a class even though the threshold requirements of the Rule appear to be satisfied—serves a vital systemic role. Discretion is a safety valve. It enables district judges to avoid issuing certification orders that would undermine substantive policies or set in motion unnecessary and counterproductive remedies. In the absence of this tool, lower federal courts are left only with a blunt instrument to avoid adverse results in difficult cases: categorical limitations on the threshold conditions of certification, which threaten to constrain class litigation in all types of disputes. At the same time, the discretionary power to decline certification raises legitimate questions about fairness, consistency of application, and the danger that courts will make inappropriate legislative judgments. The courts of appeals have addressed these concerns in a range of cases over the last five decades, and more attention to the limits of these discretionary powers is needed.

⁶ See, e.g., Reeb v. Ohio Dep't of Rehab. & Corr., 435 F.3d 639, 643 (6th Cir. 2006) (noting a district court's "inherent power to manage and control its own pending litigation").

⁷ FED. R. CIV. P. 1.

The recent decision of the Supreme Court in *Shady Grove Orthopedic Associates v. Allstate Insurance Co.*⁸ makes the need for a systematic examination of these matters more salient. In one of the few passages that garnered a majority of an otherwise fractured opinion, the Court used language that could be read to deprive district courts of any discretion when deciding whether certification is appropriate in a given case⁹—a holding that would upend forty-five years of practice under modern Rule 23. Using language to describe Rule 23(b) that I have found in no other reported decision, the majority explained that “[t]he discretion suggested by Rule 23’s ‘may’ is discretion residing in the plaintiff [and not the district court]: He may bring his claim in a class action if he wishes.”¹⁰ The Court did not indicate that it was effecting any radical change, nor did it acknowledge any need to harmonize its assertion with the decades of federal judicial holdings recognizing the discretion of district courts in matters related to certification, including multiple statements by the Court itself.¹¹ Rather, the majority spoke in a register that suggested it did not believe it was saying anything surprising.

To paraphrase Professor David Shapiro, in a society where revolution is not the order of the day, it would disserve the drafters of the Federal Rules to impute a revolutionary purpose to unremarkable language.¹² A ruling that lower federal courts lack discretion in deciding whether a suit should be certified for class treatment would be revolutionary, and a careful examination of the majority’s discussion of Rule 23 in Shady Grove makes clear that the ruling calls for no such revolution.

This Article undertakes three tasks. Part I examines the abuse of discretion standard in class certification and its place in broader academic and judicial discussions about the nature of procedural discretion. Part II then sets forth a descriptive account of the discretion that federal courts have understood themselves to possess in class certification proceedings under modern Rule 23, and it attempts to develop a useful taxonomy in describing the different modes in which that discretion has operated. My focus is legal doctrine as manifested in reported judicial decisions, an incomplete source

⁸ 130 S. Ct. 1431 (2010).

⁹ Id. at 1437–38.

¹⁰ Id. at 1438.

¹¹ See, e.g., Califano v. Yamasaki, 442 U.S. 682, 703 (1979) (“The certification of a nationwide class, like most issues arising under Rule 23, is committed in the first instance to the discretion of the district court.”).

¹² See David L. Shapiro, Continuity and Change in Statutory Interpretation, 67 N.Y.U. L. REV. 921, 941–42 (1992) (discussing judicial resistance to change imposed by the plain language of statutes).

for discerning the actual practice of trial courts, but still indispensable in assessing the parameters within which that practice has unfolded. This overview is the product of close analysis of approximately one hundred class action rulings that discuss the nature of discretion in class certification, drawn, in turn, from the review of a larger universe of cases assembled with the help of an invaluable research assistant. I make no claim that the results are comprehensive, but I believe that they make possible a representative account of the range and types of discretion that lower federal courts have understood themselves to possess when considering certification requests.

With this body of material set forth for discussion, Part III provides an argument about the systemic function of discretion in class certification and the institutional implications of different species of discretion in the certification process. Part III also reexamines the Shady Grove decision in light of the preceding discussion, asking how much past practice in class adjudication the ruling unsettles. The answer to that question is: not much. Shady Grove can be harmonized with the large body of discretionary practice undertaken by lower federal courts in class certification proceedings, and there is reason to hope that this harmonization will prompt more active attention to the nature and boundaries of lower court discretion in class action litigation going forward.

I. THE ABUSE OF DISCRETION STANDARD IN CLASS CERTIFICATION

The classic discussion of procedural discretion and appellate review in the academic literature comes from Judge Henry Friendly's canonical lecture Indiscretion About Discretion.¹³ Throughout that essay, Judge Friendly emphasizes the need to distinguish between respective areas of competence and systemic concerns when defining the relationship between trial courts and appellate courts in discretionary matters.¹⁴ Determinations that benefit from "the trial court's superior opportunities to reach a correct result" through direct contact with parties, witnesses, and events are more appropriate recipients of wide discretionary berth, as are those situations that require a balancing of factors "so numerous, variable and subtle that the fashioning of rigid rules would be more likely to impair [the trial judge's] ability to deal fairly with a particular problem than to lead to a just result."¹⁵

¹³ Henry J. Friendly, Indiscretion About Discretion, 31 EMORY L.J. 747 (1982). Judge Friendly drew upon Professor Rosenberg's important treatment of the issue in Maurice Rosenberg, Judicial Discretion of the Trial Court, Viewed from Above, 22 SYRACUSE L. REV. 635 (1971).

¹⁴ See generally Friendly, supra note 13.

¹⁵ Id. at 760 (alteration in original) (quoting United States v. McCoy, 517 F.2d 41, 44 (7th Cir. 1975) (Stevens, J.)).

On the other end of his spectrum, Judge Friendly places those cases in which “Congress has declared a national policy and enlisted the aid of the courts’ equity powers in its enforcement”—circumstances where “the need for uniformity and predictability demand thorough appellate review.”¹⁶ This analytical framework, placing matters that largely concern factual determinations in opposition to matters involving substantive legal policy, is now regularly incorporated into discussions about judicial discretion. The distinction tracks and expands upon the terms “primary discretion” and “secondary discretion” that Professor Rosenberg had earlier introduced into the literature and that are still in use.¹⁷

It is worth noting how Judge Friendly uses this analytical framework in his published lecture. The Judge saw courts exhibiting a lack of appreciation for the substantive policy implications of their procedural rulings. But this did not lead him to conclude that the ability of courts to exercise judgment should be reduced by more strictly defined legislative rules. Rather, Judge Friendly emphasizes the distinction, often lost, between the overall role of discretion in a judicial system and the prerogative of trial courts, as opposed to appellate courts, in exercising that discretion:

A good deal of confusion has been generated by failure to distinguish between two uses of the word “discretion.” The one with which I primarily concern myself today, namely how far an appellate court is bound to sustain rulings of the trial judge which it disapproves but does not consider to be outside the ball park—a question of the allocation of an admitted power within the judicial system—is quite different from the question whether, as a normative matter, it is wise for lawmakers to insist on rigid rules in the interest of certainty, no matter how harshly these may operate in some cases, and whether it is not better to prescribe accordion-like standards that afford the courts some dispensing powers to accomplish what they perceive to be justice. To say the latter does not necessarily entail that such discretionary power should be vested predominantly in the trial court rather than in the entire judicial system.¹⁸

Indiscretion About Discretion urges an analytical shift toward appellate constraints in the administration of those flexible standards that have substantive policy implications. In Judge Friendly’s view, “broad judicial ¹⁶ Id. at 783-84.

¹⁷ See Rosenberg, supra note 13, at 637 (defining “primary discretion” as the power of courts to make judgments free from “decision-constraining rules,” and “secondary discretion” as a limitation on the error-correcting function of lower courts in a multilevel court system).

¹⁸ Friendly, supra note 13, at 754-55.

review is necessary” in such cases “to preserve the most basic principle of jurisprudence” that “we must act alike in all cases of like nature.”¹⁹

A year following the publication of his lecture, with his thoughts in this area presumably sharpened by the exercise, Judge Friendly had the opportunity to write his views into law. In Abrams v. Interco Inc., Judge Friendly penned an opinion agreeing with a district court that problems of notice and manageability made a nationwide class inappropriate.²⁰ Though affirming the denial of certification, the Judge took the occasion to discount the relevance of the abuse of discretion standard to questions of class certification:

Abuse of discretion can be found far more readily on appeals from the denial or grant of class action status than where the issue is, for example, the curtailment of cross-examination or the grant or denial of a continuance. . . . While no two cases will be exactly alike, a court of appeals can no more tolerate divergence by a district judge from the principles it has developed on this subject than it would under a standard of full review—and this even though the district judge has adduced what would be plausible grounds for his ruling if the issue were arising for the first time. Except to the extent that the ruling is based on determinations of fact . . . or where the trial judge’s experience in the instant case or in similar cases has given him a degree of knowledge superior to that of appellate judges, as often occurs, review of class action determinations for “abuse of discretion” [would] not differ greatly from review for error.²¹

Judge Friendly’s formulation continues to shape the case law in the Second Circuit, though in a strangely altered form: that circuit now maintains that appellate courts are “noticeably less deferential when the district court has denied class status than when it has certified a class.”²² Why an appellate court should show greater deference in its review of an order granting

¹⁹ Id. at 758.

²⁰ 719 F.2d 23, 30-31 (2d Cir. 1983).

²¹ Id. at 28.

²² Parker v. Time Warner Entm’t Co., 331 F.3d 13, 18 (2d Cir. 2003) (alterations omitted); see also Heerwagen v. Clear Channel Commc’ns, 435 F.3d 219, 225 (2d Cir. 2006) (citing Parker, 331 F.3d at 18) (“When reviewing a denial of class certification, we accord the district court noticeably less deference than when we review a grant of certification.”), overruled on other grounds by Teamsters Local 445 Freight Div. Pension Fund v. Bombardier, Inc., 546 F.3d 196 (2d Cir. 2008). The Vermont Supreme Court has politely disassociated itself from this unbalanced formulation of the standard. See Salatino v. Chase, 939 A.2d 482, 485 (Vt. 2007) (“We . . . decline to construe Vermont Rule 23 as the Second Circuit construed the analogous federal rule”).

certification than in its review of an order denying certification is not apparent.²³

Other federal courts of appeals have exhibited a range of approaches when defining the procedural discretion that district courts enjoy in the class certification process. The practice of giving deference on the highly fact-bound components of the certification analysis is widespread and apparently uncontroversial, as Judge Friendly argued it should be. For example, in a 1976 ruling, Hornreich v. Plant Industries, Inc., the Ninth Circuit upheld a district court's denial of certification in a shareholder derivative suit on adequacy of representation grounds.²⁴ Explaining that "[d]etermination of right to bring a class action . . . is in the considered discretion of the trial court," the Ninth Circuit observed that "the evidence is not wholly undisputed" and "there is a possibility that some of the facts [regarding adequacy] might not in themselves prevent a derivative suit."²⁵ Nonetheless, the court held that, "when considered in totality, we cannot say that the district court abused its discretion in denying appellant's claim to proceed."²⁶ Nearly thirty-five years later, the Eighth Circuit employed a similar standard in Rattray v. Woodbury County, upholding a district court's finding that a plaintiff's significant delay in seeking class certification had revealed the plaintiff and her lawyers to be inadequate class representatives.²⁷ "Having worked with counsel for more than a year in this case," the court explained, "the district court has a better vantage point from which to determine whether the delay in moving for certification suggests that [plaintiff's] counsel would not effectively pursue the interests of absent class ²³ The proposition appears to trace back to Robidoux v. Celani, 987 F.2d 931 (2d Cir. 1993). Robidoux mistakenly cites Abrams as already imposing this distinction between review of orders granting certification and review of orders denying certification, and it offers no further analysis for why this distinction is appropriate or desirable. Id. at 935. There is no basis for such a pre-certification distinction in the text of Rule 23 itself, and any argument that the underlying law in a given case strongly favors certification would have to operate on a substance-specific rather than a trans-substantive basis. See Tobias Barrington Wolff, Managerial Judging and Substantive Law, 90 WASH. U. L. REV. 1027, 1067 (2013) (discussing the potential role of the underlying substantive law in shaping the actions of a court in complex litigation).

Robidoux also carries forward Judge Friendly's observation that nondeferral review of class certification is warranted where appellate courts "have built a body of case law with respect to class action status." 987 F.2d at 935. That is a defensible approach to appellate review of certification decisions (though not the only one, as the cases in this Part demonstrate), but it offers no support for a distinction between appellate review of certification grants and review of certification denials, as the Robidoux court seemed to believe.

²⁴ 535 F.2d 550, 552 (9th Cir. 1976).

²⁵ Id.

²⁶ Id.

²⁷ 614 F.3d 831, 836-37 (8th Cir. 2010).

members.”²⁸ Appellate courts have shown similar deference to district courts on questions of manageability, provided that the trial judge’s ruling is undergirded by a careful examination of the issue,²⁹ and on questions of commonality and predominance when the necessary judgments involve a close examination of ambiguous facts.³⁰

Appellate courts have also given deference on certification questions that implicate broader issues of procedural or legislative policy—the types of cases for which Judge Friendly argued that trial courts should have circumscribed authority. In one recent ruling, Shook v. Board of County Commissioners of El Paso,³¹ the Tenth Circuit embraced this species of deference in unusually explicit terms. The case involved a 23(b)(2) action for injunctive relief filed on behalf of mentally ill inmates in a Colorado county jail who alleged unconstitutional confinement conditions and inadequate care.³² The trial judge refused to certify, finding that the breadth with which the plaintiffs had defined the class presented difficulties in crafting a standard of care applicable to all class members and introduced too many questions that would depend upon members’ individual circumstances.³³ The appellate court found these to be acceptable grounds for the district court’s denial of class certification, despite substantial room for disagreement about its conclusions. In affirming the denial of class certification, the Tenth Circuit explicitly reserved the possibility that another district court might come to a different conclusion in a future case, stating “[w]hile we very well may have made a different decision had the issue been presented to us as an initial matter, and while other district courts perhaps could have chosen, or could choose, to certify similar classes, we cannot say that the district court’s assessment was beyond the pale.”³⁴ In reviewing the obstacles to certification

²⁸ Id. at 836; see also De Leon-Granados v. Eller & Sons Trees, Inc., 497 F.3d 1214, 1220-21 (11th Cir. 2007) (affirming the district court’s certification and deferring to its decision to delay resolving a dispute about the adequacy of the named representatives until a fuller factual record was developed).

²⁹ See, e.g., In re Sch. Asbestos Litig., 789 F.2d 996, 998, 1011 (3d Cir. 1986) (expressing “misgivings” about the manageability of a nationwide asbestos abatement suit, but affirming class certification because “[m]anageability is a practical problem, one with which a district court generally has a greater degree of expertise and familiarity than does an appellate court”).

³⁰ See, e.g., Mayer v. Mylod, 988 F.2d 635, 640-41 (6th Cir. 1993) (affirming a district court’s denial of certification in a securities action, despite some errors of law in framing questions under Rule 23(a), because “the district court is in the best position to determine whether the complaints of investors who rely on different corporate statements are sufficiently similar to warrant class certification”).

³¹ 543 F.3d 597 (10th Cir. 2008).

³² Id. at 600-01.

³³ Id. at 602-03.

³⁴ Id. at 603-04.

that the trial judge identified, the court acknowledged that “the sorts of problems highlighted by the district court may have been mitigated, or perhaps avoided, by the use of subclasses,”³⁵ but the Supreme Court has placed the onus of proposing subclasses on the party seeking certification,³⁶ and the Shook court found that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in declining to consider the issue sua sponte.³⁷ An appellate court’s role, the Tenth Circuit found, is to ask “whether the district court’s decision ‘exceeded the bounds of permissible choice,’ a standard that . . . acknowledges the possibility that polar opposite decisions may both fall within the ‘range of possible outcomes the facts and law at issue can fairly support.’”³⁸

Shook’s statement of appellate deference to trial court discretion is one of the broadest I have discovered in a case where certification turns on questions of underlying substantive policy rather than on factual disputes or management problems. But it does not stand alone. Many circuits have found that broad policy considerations call for discretion in the certification decision, often through the mechanism of the superiority requirement, and they have concluded that appellate courts should review such discretion deferentially.

Several such rulings may be found in cases arising under the federal Truth in Lending Act (TILA), a statute that played a significant role in early interpretations of the 1966 version of Rule 23. Under the original version of the Act enacted in 1968, creditors were subject to statutory damages for each instance in which they failed to disclose specified information “to any person”³⁹—a provision that opened the door to crushing aggregate liability in some cases. When the dangers of the TILA became apparent, Congress amended the statute to set a $500,000 cap on total recovery in class action proceedings and to give courts leeway to determine appropriate total damages, taking into account “among other relevant

³⁵ Id. at 606.

³⁶ See id. at 607 (citing U.S. Parole Comm’n v. Geraghty, 445 U.S. 388, 408 (1980)).

³⁷ See id. (“While the district court could have sua sponte suggested subclassing as a possible solution to Rule 23(b)(2) problems, the Supreme Court has indicated that courts do not bear any obligation to do so”). As other courts have pointed out, Geraghty affirmed the portion of the Third Circuit ruling that required the district court on remand to consider the issue of subclasses. See, e.g., Fink v. Nat’l Sav. & Trust Co., 772 F.2d 951, 961 (D.C. Cir. 1985) (“While the court need not take initiative, Geraghty holds, it must weigh the possibility of subclasses or of certifying a narrower class.”). “[T]he burden of constructing subclasses”—that is, determining what specific subclasses might resolve potential obstacles to certification—falls exclusively on the parties. Geraghty, 445 U.S. at 408.

³⁸ Shook, 543 F.3d at 610 (quoting United States v. McComb, 519 F.3d 1049, 1053 (10th Cir. 2007)).

³⁹ 15 U.S.C. § 1640(a) (1968), amended by 15 U.S.C. § 1640(a) (1976).

factors, the amount of any actual damages awarded, the frequency and persistence of failures of compliance by the creditor, the resources of the creditor, the number of persons adversely affected, and the extent to which the creditor's failure of compliance was intentional.”⁴⁰ Under these amendments, Congress placed its imprimatur upon the use of the class action to enforce the TILA, but it invited courts to use their judgment in determining appropriate damages and, by implication, whether class treatment was appropriate at all. Congress, in other words, had “declared a national policy and enlisted the aid of the courts’ equity powers in its enforcement”—the sort of circumstance that Judge Friendly believed called for “uniformity and predictability” by way of “thorough appellate review.”⁴¹

But several circuits followed a different path, treating district court certification rulings in TILA cases with deference and exhibiting tolerance for a lack of strict uniformity. *Watkins v. Simmons & Clark, Inc.*⁴² is one such case. In Watkins, the Sixth Circuit reviewed the decision of a district court to deny certification of a class comprising about one thousand customers of a small Michigan retailer who claimed TILA violations in the wording of a retail credit sales contract.⁴³ The district court found these violations to be only technical in nature, emphasized that customers had suffered no actual damages, and noted that the company had quickly remedied the error after the violation was called to its attention.⁴⁴ In light of these facts, the trial judge concluded that “maintenance of the class action . . . [was] an unnecessary overreaction to the violation here” and hence not a superior method of granting relief under Rule 23(b)(3).⁴⁵ The Sixth Circuit affirmed, but only because of the deference it believed was due to the district court. “[T]he technical nature of the violations may well argue in favor of the appropriateness of the class action here,” the court explained, as class certification might be necessary to call violations to the attention of consumers who would otherwise never learn of them.⁴⁶ Characterizing these arguments as “persuasive,” the court said that “[w]ere the certification issue before us de novo we may very well have certified the class.”⁴⁷ Reversing the district court’s decision, however, would “as a practical matter” constitute a holding that certification is required in all cases, “effectively negat[ing] the ⁴⁰ 15 U.S.C. § 1640(a) (1976).

⁴¹ Friendly, supra note 13, at 783-84.

⁴² 618 F.2d 398 (6th Cir. 1980).

⁴³ Id. at 398-99.

⁴⁴ Id. at 403.

⁴⁵ Id.

⁴⁶ Id. at 403-04.

⁴⁷ Id. at 404.

discretion of a district court to certify a class.”⁴⁸ The court therefore affirmed, reiterating the general proposition that TILA class actions are “desirable and should be encouraged” and holding that “class certification should be denied only in a case involving technical violations and only where the district court, in the exercise of discretion, believes that certification is unwarranted.”⁴⁹

Despite setting forth a broad statement about legislative policy, the Sixth Circuit preserved a role for district courts to exercise discretion in determining when the purposes of the TILA would be furthered by class certification in a given case. Other circuits followed the Sixth Circuit’s lead on this point,⁵⁰ and, in some cases, TILA rulings on appellate deference were translated to disputes involving other substantive legal regimes.⁵¹

Of course, appellate courts have also reviewed certification decisions more aggressively in cases implicating substantive law questions or broad disputes over aggregation policy. For example, in the 1970s and 1980s, a number of circuits adopted strong presumptions in favor of class treatment in civil rights cases, and they exercised invasive review when district courts denied certification in circumstances that undermined that substantive commitment.⁵² The courts of appeals have also articulated strong aggregation policies in some commercial areas and shown little deference when district courts have failed to enforce those policies. Thus in Kirkpatrick v. J.C. Bradford & Co., the Eleventh Circuit reversed the order of a district court denying class certification on predominance and adequacy grounds in a securities action in which the plaintiffs claimed that a brokerage house had

⁴⁸ Id.

⁴⁹ Id.

⁵⁰ See, e.g., Shroder v. Suburban Coastal Corp., 729 F.2d 1371, 1377-78 (11th Cir. 1984) (affirming the district court’s denial of certification in a case involving approximately five hundred home purchasers given documents by a title company alleged to contain TILA violations and giving the district court discretion to determine when a class action is a “superior” remedy in cases involving technical TILA violations).

⁵¹ For example, the decision of the Eleventh Circuit in Shroder played a role in another Eleventh Circuit case, Hines v. Widnall, involving alleged violations under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. 334 F.3d 1253, 1254-55 (11th Cir. 2003). The Eleventh Circuit affirmed a denial of certification based on a lack of typicality, emphasizing that “whether, in reviewing the record de novo, we would certify the class is of no consequence” and that the district court’s conclusions about typicality were “within the range of permissible choice and thus not a clear error of judgment.” Id. at 1257.

⁵² See, e.g., Horton v. Goose Creek Indep. Sch. Dist., 690 F.2d 470, 487 (5th Cir. 1982) (articulating a strong presumption “in favor of making [the class procedure] available to litigants when possible” in a student civil rights case); Coley v. Clinton, 635 F.2d 1364, 1378 (8th Cir. 1980) (insisting that Rule 23(b)(2) “must be read liberally in the context of civil rights suits,” and that “[t]his principle of construction limits the district court’s discretion”).

circulated misleading information concerning an oil and gas fund that later collapsed.⁵³

The appellate court began by reversing the district court on a merits question, finding that plaintiffs were entitled to pursue a fraud-on-the-market theory based on a common course of misleading statements issued by the fund and its agents.⁵⁴ Rather than remanding for reconsideration of the predominance analysis in light of this revised standard, the appellate court found that “[i]n view of the overwhelming number of common factual and legal issues presented by plaintiffs’ misrepresentation claims . . . the mere presence of the factual issue of individual reliance could not render the claims unsuitable for class treatment.”⁵⁵ The Eleventh Circuit determined that it was appropriate to set a uniform policy on aggregation where the complaint “alleges a single conspiracy and fraudulent scheme against a large number of individuals” and it constrained the discretion of trial courts to deny certification in such cases.⁵⁶ The court also found that the district court had applied an erroneous standard in assessing the adequacy of the named plaintiffs to represent the class.⁵⁷ Here, in contrast, it did remand for a new determination by the district court after correcting the adequacy standard, explaining that “[i]n contrast to the more strictly legal questions presented by the [fraud-on-the-market and predominance issues], the adequacy of class representation is primarily a factual issue that is best left for determination by the district court.”⁵⁸

Finally, Antonin Scalia had an opportunity to speak about the relationship between trial and appellate courts in matters relating to discretion and class certification in a dispute that he heard while a judge on the D.C. Circuit. The views he expressed in that case are an important point of reference in assessing the decision he later authored in Shady Grove, as Part III explains. In Fink v. National Savings & Trust Co., the D.C. Circuit, per Judge Abner Mikva, reversed several rulings of a district judge in an ERISA dispute.⁵⁹ On the question of class certification, Judge Mikva wrote that the trial court had abused its discretion when it denied class certification on typicality and ⁵³ 827 F.2d 718, 720-21, 728 (11th Cir. 1987).

⁵⁴ Id. at 722 (“We cannot agree, however, with the court’s rejection of the fraud-on-the-market theory as a basis for class action treatment.”).

⁵⁵ Id. at 724-25.

⁵⁶ Id. at 725 (internal quotation marks omitted).

⁵⁷ The district court required class representatives to “demonstrate . . . that individually they will pursue with vigor the legal claims of the class,” a prerequisite that the appellate court found did “not vindicate the policies and purposes of Rule 23” nor the substantive interests of the underlying regulatory scheme. Id. at 727.

⁵⁸ Id. at 728.

⁵⁹ 772 F.2d 951, 953 (D.C. Cir. 1985).

adequacy grounds without conducting any hearings or making any findings, despite the presence of substantial and contested factual issues, leaving the appellate court with no meaningful basis to conduct its review.⁶⁰ Judge Scalia strenuously objected, arguing that this form of appellate review intruded inappropriately upon the district court's discretionary control over class certification.⁶¹ Reminding the majority "that the District Court has broad discretion in determining whether a suit should proceed as a class action," Judge Scalia offered a different view of the factual record.⁶² Certain "undisputed facts" suggested the possibility of defenses peculiar to the named representatives and imperfectly aligned interests within the class, he explained, and these potential obstacles to certification were "more than enough to prevent our finding the District Court's refusal to certify [on typicality and adequacy grounds] an abuse of discretion."⁶³ The fact that the trial court had not identified these potential obstacles to certification as the basis of its holding did not change the analysis, in Judge Scalia's view.⁶⁴ It was enough that the trial court would have been acting within the permissible bounds of its discretion had it relied upon these features of the suit to deny certification.⁶⁵ Reversing under those conditions, Judge Scalia said, "represent[ed] . . . a deep encroachment upon the domain of the District Court."⁶⁶

As framed by Judge Scalia, the contested certification questions in Fink were rooted in core questions of substantive law and aggregation policy: whether the possibility that the named plaintiffs "might be subject to defenses of estoppel inapplicable to other class members" or "might have significantly different interests" from other class members would authorize a district court to exercise discretion in declining to certify, a decision that would in turn be insulated from invasive appellate scrutiny.⁶⁷ His insistence upon the domain of the trial court in such matters places him solidly on the deferential end of the spectrum, contra Judge Friendly's more appellate-centered approach. As Part III explains, that statement of principle would be inconsistent with an excessively broad reading of Justice Scalia's later opinion in Shady Grove.

⁶⁰ Id. at 960.

⁶¹ Id. at 965 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

⁶² Id. at 964-65.

⁶³ Id.

⁶⁴ Id. at 965.

⁶⁵ Id.

⁶⁶ Id.

⁶⁷ Id.

II. AN OVERVIEW OF DISCRETION UNDER MODERN RULE 23

A. The Period of Transition Following the 1966 Revisions and Experimentation in the Face of Uncertainty

In the years following the 1966 amendments to Rule 23, federal courts faced the task of implementing an entirely new type of procedural mechanism and, in the case of Rule 23(b)(3), an entirely new type of proceeding. Of necessity, they engaged in experimentation, becoming acquainted with the operation of the new Rule and determining what types of representative suits would be possible under its provisions. In undertaking this effort, the lower federal courts were exercising a species of discretion, and some of them explicitly described their efforts in that language.

For example, in one federal securities action, Alameda Oil Co. v. Ideal Basic Industries, Inc., filed in 1968, Judge William Doyle of the District of Colorado had to decide whether a class action could proceed over claims of misrepresentation in the merger of two mineral and construction companies.⁶⁸ The action carried the potential for “tremendous” damages,⁶⁹ and although the court believed “the basic requisites for a class action [we]re satisfied,” it had questions about the merits of the fraud claim and concerns about the expense that plaintiffs would assume if the court were “to set all of the class action machinery in motion at [that] time.”⁷⁰ The court thus decided that it would be “the better part of discretion” to defer notifying class members of the proceeding and begin with “a bifurcated trial on the threshold issues at least before proceeding further.”⁷¹ Only if the plaintiffs’ claims survived this initial test would they “notify the members of the class and go on from there.”⁷² The court was candid in saying that it was uncertain about its experiment: “We are aware, of course, that the suggested approach is somewhat innovative, but the Rule 23 procedure itself is new and requires such efforts.”⁷³ As another judge hearing a securities action in the Southern District of New York had explained a few years earlier, the newly revised Rule “added . . . some devices to aid in the management of” class actions, and those tools could “provide[] the flexibility to permit [an] action to proceed” even where a lack of strict uniformity among claimants ⁶⁸ 326 F. Supp. 98, 100-01 (D. Colo. 1971).

⁶⁹ Id. at 101.

⁷⁰ Id. at 105.

⁷¹ Id.

⁷² Id.

⁷³ Id.

"might have led to a dismissal of a class action under the old rule."⁷⁴ And, of course, the Supreme Court's decision in Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, which imposed some specific constraints on innovation by district courts, arose out of a trial judge's extensive efforts to make sense of the appellate direction it was receiving in crafting an effective and practicable mechanism for recovery in a securities dispute.⁷⁵ Lower federal courts hearing class actions in the years immediately following the 1966 amendments necessarily operated in an experimental mode.

Experimentation, in turn, provided the practical and doctrinal knowledge from which the courts of appeals would sometimes craft more constraining rules. A ruling by the Second Circuit in a Rule 23(b)(3) securities class action, issued by a panel that included Judge Friendly, is illustrative. The case, Korn v. Franchard Corp., involved a prospectus issued by the general partners in a real estate venture.⁷⁶ Shareholders in the venture alleged that the prospectus contained fraudulent and misleading statements.⁷⁷ The district court concluded that typicality, adequacy of representation, and predominance all made certification inappropriate for the issue of shareholder reliance on the prospectus.⁷⁸ The court of appeals reversed, finding that "where, as here, there is a single written document charged with important omissions,"⁷⁹ the case for certification is so strong that "a district judge could not decide against allowing a class action without abusing his discretion."⁸⁰ The court canvassed recent securities rulings presenting similar facts and the approaches those courts had taken to the reliance question, finding a strong presumption that "common questions predominate" in such cases.⁸¹

We do not cite these formulations to tell the District Court that it should or must follow any of them. Our purpose is only to show that, though many paths have been taken, the federal courts have concurred in adopting procedures and rules which can reduce the difficulties of showing individual ⁷⁴ Kronenberg v. Hotel Governor Clinton, Inc., 41 F.R.D. 42, 44-45 (S.D.N.Y. 1966).

⁷⁵ 417 U.S. 156, 161-69 (1974).

⁷⁶ 456 F.2d 1206, 1207 (2d Cir. 1972).

⁷⁷ Id.

⁷⁸ Id. at 1207-08.

⁷⁹ Id. at 1212.

⁸⁰ Id. at 1208.

⁸¹ Id. at 1213. In a related study, Professor Issacharoff examined the development of the doctrine of reliance in consumer protection law and argued that "the amenability of certain claims to aggregate treatment turns on a clarification of the substantive standards for reliance," concluding that the presence of a formal reliance requirement in the substantive law need not impede class certification in the typical case. Samuel Issacharoff, The Vexing Problem of Reliance in Consumer Class Actions, 74 TUL. L. REV. 1633, 1636 (2000).

reliance. . . . It may be, as some recent prophecies have it, that future history will pulverize the current hope of avoiding unduly cumbersome litigation on the reliance phase of these 10b-5 suits, but we are not yet sure enough of that speculation to insist, as a court applying existing Rule 23, that the present course must be sharply revised—at least not on the relatively simple facts of this case.⁸²

The court of appeals felt confident enough in the treatment of reliance that had emerged through experimentation in these other cases that it declined to remand the case after correcting the district court's other errors, concluding that it was appropriate in this area of substantive law to impose a legal rule that left little room for trial-level discretion.⁸³

As the ensuing years made clear, discretion to experiment cannot amount to a suspension of the Rule's requirements, nor can a trial court defer a robust certification inquiry in the name of experimentation. The 1966 version of Rule 23(c)(1)(C) expressly invited district courts to make "conditional" determinations, and some courts relied upon that language to authorize class actions at an early stage of the proceedings without full confidence that an action was appropriate for class treatment.⁸⁴ Even where this use of conditional certification reflected genuine diligence on the part of the trial court,⁸⁵ rather than the kind of "certify now and worry later" approach that eventually came under heavy criticism,⁸⁶ the practice had the ⁸⁴ See, e.g., Coburn v. 4-R Corp., 77 F.R.D. 43, 46 (E.D. Ky. 1977) ("Determinations of class action are only conditional and may always be altered or amended before a decision on the merits." (citing FED. R. CIV. P. 23(c)(1))); Ridgeway v. Int'l Bhd. of Elec. Workers, Local No. 134, 74 F.R.D. 597, 601, 604 (N.D. Ill. 1977) (relying upon Rule 23(c)(1) to enter a "conditional order" of certification despite potential commonality problems, which could be "winnow[ed] out" at later stages of the proceeding).

⁸² Korn, 456 F.2d at 1213.

⁸³ Id. at 1208.

⁸⁵ One prominent example of this is Judge William Schwarzer's opinion in Harriss v. Pan American World Airways, Inc., 74 F.R.D. 24 (N.D. Cal. 1977). Judge William Schwarzer, a noted expert in the fields of procedure and judicial administration, invoked the language of former Rule 23(c)(1)(C) to explain that conditional certification was "nothing more than a tentative determination for procedural purposes" that reserved to the court the opportunity to "determine whether any further proceedings directed to the issue of relief, if any, may be maintained as a class action" and address "such questions as subclassing, notice and intervention." Id. at 47.

⁸⁶ The quoted language is from Southwestern Refining Co. v. Bernal, 22 S.W.3d 425, 435 (Tex. 2000), a significant ruling that reined in certification practices by trial courts in Texas. For another example of an appellate ruling from the same era in which the court disapproved of the aggressive use of conditional certification, see Andrews v. AT&T, 95 F.3d 1014, 1019, 1025 (11th Cir. 1996), abrogated on other grounds by Douglas Asphalt Co. v. QORE, Inc., 657 F.3d 1146 (11th Cir. 2011), in which the Eleventh Circuit reversed a district court's certification of a massive worldwide class action against telecom companies for their hosting of 900-number telemarketing programs alleged to constitute illegal gambling. In response to concerns about the management of the proceeding, capacity to impose settlement pressure on defendants and undermine the interests of plaintiffs in a manner exceeding the legitimate scope of the Rule's authority. The 2003 amendments to Rule 23 therefore eliminated all reference to conditional certification, with the Advisory Committee's note emphasizing that "[a] court that is not satisfied that the requirements of Rule 23 have been met should refuse certification until they have been met."⁸⁷

Experimentation in class certification, however, is not exclusively an artifact of the period following the 1966 amendments, nor need it indicate that district courts have shown a lack of diligence when resolving tough questions. Lower federal courts have found that discretion to experiment is sometimes necessary when they are presented with novel and intractable litigation challenges. A 1993 decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit helps make this point. In Central Wesleyan College v. W.R. Grace & Co., an asbestos case arising from the abatement and property damage phase of that decades-long litigation, the Fourth Circuit affirmed a district court's decision to certify a nationwide class under Rule 23(b)(3) of all public and private colleges and universities that owned buildings containing friable asbestos, which federal law required them to remove.⁸⁸ There were many liability issues common to the class, but also serious questions about predominance and manageability, coupled with a history of similar litigation in the Third Circuit in a nationwide damages action on behalf of public school districts that gave reason for skepticism.⁸⁹ Having recounted that history, the Fourth Circuit noted that it reviewed the district court's the district court insisted that it "can and will assemble the resources that [the proceeding] requires," but the court of appeals found this assurance inadequate to meet threshold certification requirements and inappropriate insofar as it suggested certifying without regard to the impact upon judicial economy. Id. at 1025.

⁸⁷ FED. R. CIV. P. 23(c)(1) advisory committee's note to the 2003 amendments. Prior to its amendment, Judge Marvin Frankel foresaw the potential for Rule 23(c)(1)(C) to cause mischief and treated the provision with caution, acknowledging that it "may be a source of some comfort to the judge confronting the pressure to rule in some fashion when he can perceive only dimly or not at all the dimensions of the material facts," but that "we should avoid finding too much comfort in this assurance that there will be time to correct the mistakes." Marvin E. Frankel, Some Preliminary Observations Concerning Civil Rule 23, 43 F.R.D. 39, 42 (1968).

⁸⁸ 6 F.3d 177, 190 (4th Cir. 1993).

⁸⁹ Id. at 182. The Third Circuit had affirmed the certification of a nationwide class action for compensatory damages in In re School Asbestos Litigation, 789 F.2d 996, 998-99 (3d Cir. 1986). Six years later, the Third Circuit reported in a subsequent appeal that "numerous delays" had plagued preparations for trial, and the district court was only prepared to move forward on a trial regarding conspiracy and concert of action that was divided across several trials with discrete groups of defendants "[i]n order to keep trial manageable." In re Sch. Asbestos Litig., 977 F.2d 764, 772 (3d Cir. 1992). In that same appeal, the district judge was removed from the case because of an appearance of partiality created by his attendance at a plaintiff-centric conference, creating yet more challenges in bringing the case to trial. Id. at 778-88.

ruling “with the caution befitting contemplation of any experimental mechanism.”⁹⁰ Even so, the court affirmed.⁹¹

The district court had expressly invoked the conditional certification provision of old Rule 23(c)(1)(C) in its order, a point that the Fourth Circuit emphasized in explaining its affirmance.⁹² Some factual questions remained to be answered about the suitability of the named plaintiff to represent the entire class of defendants, questions as to which the district court “defer[red] a final decision” pending later discovery to determine which products were installed in which institutions.⁹³ Under currently controlling authority, a district court would need to satisfy itself that the requirements of Rule 23 were satisfied prior to certifying the class, with sufficient discovery in the certification hearing to support a “rigorous analysis.”⁹⁴ That component of the district court’s ruling probably does not survive subsequent doctrinal developments.

But the primary role that the Fourth Circuit recognized for experimentation in class certification did not concern the district court’s deferral of questions relating to typicality and adequacy. Rather, the greatest source of concern related to the manageability of large asbestos proceedings and the systemic benefit that class certification would provide when measured against other forms of consolidation—questions that lower federal courts were struggling to answer at the time. The Fourth Circuit acknowledged the troubled history of the school district litigation as a cautionary tale but also believed that the district court’s certification was based on a reasonable hope that “[l]essons . . . have been learned from the litigation in Philadelphia,” and that the suit before it represented “an opportunity to apply” those lessons.⁹⁵ That being so, the appeals court held the certification order fell within the district court’s “considerable discretion” to employ the class device “to assist in resolving asbestos litigation nationwide and to avoid some of the enormous waste of resources that could accompany individual litigation.”⁹⁶

These efforts to apply the class mechanism to property damage claims cannot claim wild success. The Supreme Court’s two major statements on ⁹⁰ Cent. Wesleyan Coll., 6 F.3d at 183.

⁹¹ Id. at 190.

⁹² See id. at 186 (“The tentative, limited nature of the conditional certification also counsels in favor of affirmance.”).

⁹³ Cent. Wesleyan Coll. v. W.R. Grace & Co., 143 F.R.D. 628, 642 (D.S.C. 1992).

⁹⁴ Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. 2541, 2551 (2011).

⁹⁵ Cent. Wesleyan Coll., 6 F.3d at 186.

⁹⁶ Id. (internal quotation marks omitted).

asbestos litigation did not address property damage claims directly,⁹⁷ but the limits they imposed would apply in equal measure in such cases, and the subsequent history of property claims in the federal courts is one of bankruptcy rather than class litigation.⁹⁸ Asbestos claims are perhaps the most acute example of what Judge Friendly described as a specific area of substantive litigation in which discretion comes to be constrained by the articulation of controlling principles by appellate courts.⁹⁹ Even in such a case, however, discretion to experiment plays a role, providing practical experience with litigation dynamics and an opportunity to explore doctrinal solutions. It is this type of expertise that can eventually make clear the need for constraints upon discretion.

B. Management of Class Proceedings

Rule 23(b)(3) expressly requires the trial court to consider “the likely difficulties in managing a class action”¹⁰⁰ in a proceeding certified under that provision—a requirement normally associated with the workability of a trial and associated liability and damages determinations. Distinct from that type of “manageability” concern is the more prosaic management of the operations of a class proceeding on a day-to-day basis, including the behavior of the participating lawyers and parties. Discretion in this sort of internal management of class proceedings has always been recognized as a necessary feature of modern Rule 23.¹⁰¹ Judge Marvin E. Frankel explored this proposition in his Preliminary Observations, published shortly after the 1966 revisions. In that essay, he introduces his analysis of select provisions of the new Rule in the following terms:

⁹⁷ See Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corp., 527 U.S. 815, 864-65 (1999) (holding a (b)(1)(B) mandatory settlement class could not be used to settle asbestos litigation); Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 628-29 (1996) (rejecting a (b)(3) settlement class used to resolve asbestos litigation).

⁹⁸ See, e.g., In re W.R. Grace & Co., 729 F.3d 311, 314-15 (3d Cir. 2013) (detailing the proliferation of lawsuits against the defendant in Central Wesleyan College that ultimately led the company to seek protection and discharge in bankruptcy).

⁹⁹ See Friendly, supra note 13, at 754-55 (suggesting that certain areas of law may require “rigid rules” to promote the “interest of certainty”).

¹⁰⁰ FED. R. CIV. P. 23(b)(3)(D).

¹⁰¹ The Sixth Circuit has suggested a link between the discretion of district courts in matters relating to class certification and “the inherent power [of a trial court] to manage and control its own pending litigation.” Beattie v. CenturyTel, Inc., 511 F.3d 554, 559 (6th Cir. 2007). This framing of the issue appears to imply a broad formulation of the deference owed the district court in the exercise of that discretion. See id. at 559-60 (“The district court’s decision certifying the class is subject to a very limited review and will be reversed only upon a strong showing that the district court’s decision was a clear abuse of discretion.” (quoting Olden v. Lafarge Corp., 383 F.3d 495, 507 (6th Cir. 2004))).

The revisions in Rule 23 effective July 1, 1966, effect broad and challenging innovations. The dimensions of the changes cannot possibly be stated in certain detail at this early stage of their existence. The Rule—quite deliberately, I think—tends to ask more questions than it answers. It is neither a set of prescriptions nor a blue print. It is, rather, a broad outline of general policies and directions. As the commentators have said, it confides to the district judges a broad range of discretion. And this means, as you all know so well, not that we're about to get drunk with power, but that we've been challenged to piece out a huge body of procedural common law by giving all the hard labor and creative imagination we can muster for this purpose.¹⁰²

Judge Frankel went on to identify a range of issues, including class notice and the timing of the certification hearing, that would require creativity and adaptability from courts applying the new rule.¹⁰³

These predictions were quickly reflected in the case law. Matters involving the form and content of notice to the class were regularly recognized as requiring discretion on the part of trial courts. In Gold Strike Stamp Co. v. Christensen, one of the early appellate rulings under the new Rule, the Tenth Circuit denied a request for mandamus intervention following a district court's order certifying an antitrust class under Rule 23(b)(3) and directing that notice be provided to the class members.¹⁰⁴ Assessing the content of the notice, the appellate court found that the trial judge had included all the information expressly required by Rule 23 along with enough additional guidance to allow class members to make a decision without being overwhelmed with detail.¹⁰⁵ As the court explained, “the Rule places the control of class actions and in particular the issuance of notice to members of the class under the control and thus the discretion of the trial judge,” calling for a light hand in any appellate review.¹⁰⁶

¹⁰² Frankel, supra note 87, at 39 (footnote omitted).

¹⁰³ See id. at 40–41 (noting that amended Rule 23 does not specifically address the problems attendant to notice and timing, and calling on judges to answer these questions in the particular circumstances); see also Richard L. Marcus, Slouching Toward Discretion, 78 NOTRE DAME L. REV. 1561, 1601–02 (2003) (describing the period following the 1966 revision to Rule 23 and explaining that “from the start, the rule was heavily laden with discretionary elements”).

¹⁰⁴ 436 F.2d 791, 799 (10th Cir. 1970).

¹⁰⁵ Id. at 798–99. This balance between pertinent information and clear, concise notice came to be recognized by the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules as a best practice of sufficient importance to warrant codification in the 2003 amendments. See FED. R. CIV. P. 23(c)(2)(B) advisory committee's note to the 2003 amendments (specifying an expanded list of requirements for the content of class notice and mandating that notice clearly and concisely state those materials “in plain, easily understood language”).

¹⁰⁶ Gold Strike Stamp, 436 F.2d at 799.

The Supreme Court addressed questions of internal management in Gulf Oil Co. v. Bernard, a case involving a broad district court order that limited the ability of class counsel to communicate with the members of a Title VII class.¹⁰⁷ Noting “the potential for abuse” in the powerful forces put in motion by the class mechanism, the Court held that district courts require broad discretion “to exercise control over a class action and to enter appropriate orders governing the conduct of counsel and parties.”¹⁰⁸ When management orders are restrictive or invasive, they must “be based on a clear record and specific findings” indicating a weighing of competing interests, a requirement that the Court found not to be satisfied in the order before it.¹⁰⁹ Bernard remains the governing authority concerning restraints on communication with class members, and it is regularly cited by lower federal courts for the broad but bounded discretion that district courts enjoy to manage the processes by which a class action is analyzed and conducted.¹¹⁰

C. Redefinition of the Class

The power of a district court to alter the definition or scope of a plaintiff’s proposed class is also well established among the lower federal courts. Much less widely appreciated is the imprimatur that the Supreme Court has given to discretionary decisions on such matters. Califano v. Yamasaki contains one of the Court’s most oft-cited statements on discretion in class certification: “[M]ost issues arising under Rule 23[are] committed in the first instance to the discretion of the district court.”¹¹¹ This statement is typically offered as generic authority for the existence of discretion in the certification analysis.¹¹² The passages from which the sentence is lifted, however, are more specific. The Court in Yamasaki recognized two propositions: (1) that district courts presented with a putative nationwide class have ¹⁰⁷ 452 U.S. 89, 103-04 (1981).

¹⁰⁸ Id. at 100.

¹⁰⁹ Id. at 101-02.

¹¹⁰ See, e.g., In re Am. Med. Sys., Inc., 75 F.3d 1069, 1079 (6th Cir. 1996) (“The trial court has broad discretion in deciding whether to certify a class, but that discretion must be exercised within the framework of Rule 23.” (citing Bernard, 452 U.S. at 100)).

¹¹¹ 442 U.S. 682, 703 (1979).

¹¹² See, e.g., Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. 2541, 2562 (2011) (Ginsburg, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (citing Yamasaki for the proposition that an appellate court should not overturn a district court’s certification unless there is an error of law or abuse of discretion); A. Benjamin Spencer, Class Actions, Heightened Commonality, and Declining Access to Justice, 93 B.U. L. REV. 441, 477 & n.195 (2013) (citing Yamasaki to support the proposition that “[e]ven in the class context, appellate courts are not in the position to provide de novo review of factual evidence, giving their own assessments without regard to the findings of the district court”).

the discretion to certify a class of lesser scope, and (2) that courts may take into account systemic considerations not specified in Rule 23 when deciding whether to exercise that discretion.¹¹³

Yamasaki involved a consolidated pair of cases in which recipients of Social Security benefits challenged an effort by the Social Security Administration to recoup overpayments from beneficiaries by withholding future benefits without first granting individual hearings to the affected recipients.¹¹⁴ In one case, the plaintiffs sought a statewide class action for residents of Hawaii, which the district court certified.¹¹⁵ In the other, Washington state plaintiffs requested a nationwide class action.¹¹⁶ The district court granted the request for certification, but it exempted from the class definition residents of Hawaii and of the Eastern District of Pennsylvania (where another proceeding had been initiated), as well as any individuals who “had participated as plaintiffs or members of a plaintiff class in litigation against the Secretary on similar issues.”¹¹⁷

On appeal, the Secretary argued broadly that class certification was categorically inappropriate under the judicial review provisions of the Social Security Act and, in the alternative, that a nationwide class was inappropriate in a case of the type before the court.¹¹⁸ The Supreme Court rejected the first argument, imposing a clear-statement rule that requires Congress to exclude class relief expressly if it wishes a statute to exclude the possibility of that tool.¹¹⁹ The Court treated the second argument as a variation on the first—here, a request for a ruling that a nationwide class is categorically inappropriate under Rule 23 itself in Social Security disputes of this kind—and it rejected that request as well.¹²⁰ But it was the categorical nature of the argument that the Court rejected. The underlying challenge to the suitability of such disputes to nationwide class treatment received more sympathetic treatment:

We concede the force of the Secretary’s contentions that nationwide class actions may have a detrimental effect by foreclosing adjudication by a number ¹¹³ See Yamasaki, 442 U.S. at 702-03 (“[A] federal court when asked to certify a nationwide class should take care to ensure that nationwide relief is indeed appropriate . . . and that certification of such a class would not improperly interfere with the litigation of similar issues in other judicial districts.”).

¹¹⁴ Id. at 684.

¹¹⁵ Id. at 687-88.

¹¹⁶ Id. at 689.

¹¹⁷ Id.

¹¹⁸ Id. at 698-99.

¹¹⁹ Id. at 700.

¹²⁰ Id. at 700-01.

of different courts and judges, and of increasing, in certain cases, the pressures on this Court's docket. It often will be preferable to allow several courts to pass on a given class claim in order to gain the benefit of adjudication by different courts in different factual contexts. For this reason, a federal court when asked to certify a nationwide class should take care to ensure that nationwide relief is indeed appropriate in the case before it, and that certification of such a class would not improperly interfere with the litigation of similar issues in other judicial districts. But we decline to adopt the extreme position that such a class may never be certified. The certification of a nationwide class, like most issues arising under Rule 23, is committed in the first instance to the discretion of the district court. On the facts of this case we cannot conclude that the District Court in [the nationwide case] abused that discretion, especially in light of its sensitivity to ongoing litigation of the same issue in other districts, and the determination that counsel was adequate to represent the class.¹²¹

Since the significance of this passage to the discretion of certifying courts appears never to have been fully appreciated in the literature, the Court's analysis warrants careful exposition. In explaining its rejection of the Secretary's categorical argument about nationwide classes, the Court emphasized that "[n]othing in Rule 23 . . . limits the geographical scope of a class action that is brought in conformity with that Rule."¹²² That is, the Rule offers no express statement imposing such a limitation. Given the posture of the Secretary's claim, the Court could have taken this silence on geography to indicate that the rule gives district courts no power to limit the scope of a plaintiff's putative class action, so long as the suit is "brought in conformity with" the provisions of Rule 23. But the Court did no such thing.

Yamasaki recognizes discretion in the district court to determine the appropriate scope of a proposed class proceeding, even in a proceeding that satisfies the express terms of the rule. The Secretary lost his appeal because the district court had not "abused that discretion" given the steps it took to avoid interference with other pending proceedings.¹²³ In deciding when to permit a nationwide injunctive class, Yamasaki explains, district courts should take into account systemic considerations that are unaddressed in the text of Rule 23(b)(2), including the possibility of "improper[] interfere[nce] with the litigation of similar issues in other judicial districts."¹²⁴ The ¹²¹ Id. at 702-03.

¹²² Id. at 702.

¹²³ Id. at 703.

¹²⁴ Id. at 702.

question of how to assess the impropriety of such interference in quality and degree in any given case is left to the discretion of future district courts.¹²⁵

Yamasaki was a (b)(2) action seeking an injunction, and one portion of the Court's analysis ties its holding to equitable principles concerning the proper scope of injunctive relief, explaining that there is no cause for a categorical prohibition on nationwide class actions in this type of Social Security claim because "the scope of injunctive relief is dictated by the extent of the violation established, not by the geographical extent of the plaintiff class."¹²⁶ The Court allowed for the possibility that a broad class definition in an equitable proceeding might afford relief "more burdensome than necessary to redress the complaining parties,"¹²⁷ a circumstance that would call for constraining the class. In other words, a (b)(2) injunctive proceeding might create the prospect of unnecessary burdens on the defendant and provoke systemic concerns about interference with parallel or related court proceedings. These would both be grounds for a district court to exercise discretion in certifying a narrower proceeding than the one proposed by the plaintiff.¹²⁸

Lower federal courts have not generally relied upon Yamasaki in exercising discretionary authority to reformulate a plaintiff's proposed class definition. Instead, they have claimed that authority in a wide variety of settings and treated it as a natural extension of their discretion to decide whether to certify at all.

In its most basic form, a court's modification of the class definition can operate to harmonize the certified class with the actual course of the ¹²⁵ In a damages class action brought under Rule 23(b)(3), these considerations may form a part of the superiority analysis, which invites the court to consider "the extent and nature of any litigation concerning the controversy already begun by or against class members" and "the desirability or undesirability of concentrating the litigation of the claims in the particular forum." FED. R. CIV. P. 23(b)(3)(B)-(C). No explicit license of this kind appears in Rule 23(b)(2).

¹²⁶ Yamasaki, 442 U.S. at 702.

¹²⁷ Id.

¹²⁸ Rule 23(c) confirms the authority of a district court to issue orders that "define the class." FED. R. CIV. P. 23(c)(1)(B). There is room for debate as to whether Rule 23(c)(1)(B) is only a housekeeping provision designed to ensure regularity between the class certification order, the litigated proceeding, and any resulting judgment, or whether it confers authority upon the court to shape the class according to its own judgment. Compare Marcus v. BMW of N. Am., LLC, 687 F.3d 583, 591-92 (3d Cir. 2012) (applying Rule 23(c)(1)(B) as a housekeeping provision to "provid[e] the parties with clarity and assist[] class members in understanding their rights"), with Pyke v. Cuomo, 209 F.R.D. 33, 38-40 (N.D.N.Y. 2002) (employing Rule 23(c)(1)(B) as both a housekeeping provision and an occasion to make judgments about the scope of the class). On either reading, Yamasaki's acknowledgment of extra-textual discretionary considerations is significant for discussions of class scope.

proceedings. In Barney v. Holzer Clinic, Ltd., for example, the Sixth Circuit found that a putative nationwide class action instituted against an Ohio medical clinic was overbroad.¹²⁹ The court deemed the nationwide scope of the class unnecessary in light of the narrow population of affected individuals—patients of a clinic that operated only in Ohio and West Virginia—and observed that the trial court and the parties had focused their efforts only on claims by Ohio citizens governed by Ohio law, raising questions about whether the interests of any claimants outside Ohio were properly represented.¹³⁰ Nonetheless, rather than reversing the judgment below and decertifying the class, the court deemed it appropriate instead “to amend the class certification so that the class includes the named plaintiffs and those similarly situated”¹³¹—a sua sponte modification that would “bring[] the formal certification into conformity with the class definition that the parties and the court below believed to have been certified.”¹³² In a similar ruling issued shortly following the 1966 amendments, a Minnesota district court hearing a constitutional challenge to a property seizure statute rejected the class definition proposed by the plaintiff and adopted a modified definition that solved ascertainability problems and still permitted the core of the plaintiff’s challenge to be certified.¹³³ The court noted: “The fact that plaintiff’s definition of the class needed modification does not require dismissal of the class action” because “[a] court can, in its discretion under the Rule, define a class in a manner which will allow utilization of the class action procedure.”¹³⁴

Federal courts have also reformulated class definitions in a more aggressive fashion, reshaping the action to resolve problems under Rule 23 and authorize a proceeding that the court deems suitable for representative treatment, even if the resulting action differs significantly from the one proposed by the plaintiff. A ruling by Judge Colleen McMahon of the Southern District of New York offers a useful illustration. In Maneely v. City of Newburgh, plaintiff Maneely had been arrested on a misdemeanor charge and subjected to a strip search that he believed to be unjustified.¹³⁵ His search allegedly happened pursuant to a city policy of subjecting all arrestees to strip search without regard to whether there was reasonable ¹²⁹ 110 F.3d 1207, 1213 (6th Cir. 1997).

¹³⁰ Id. at 1214.

¹³¹ Id.

¹³² Id. at 1215.

¹³³ Thomas v. Clarke, 54 F.R.D. 245, 249 (D. Minn. 1971).

¹³⁴ Id.

¹³⁵ 208 F.R.D. 69, 71 (S.D.N.Y. 2002).

suspicion to believe the arrestee possessed contraband or a weapon.¹³⁶ Maneely sought to represent a class of arrestees subjected to strip search without cause and to secure damages on their behalf under Rule 23(b)(3).¹³⁷ As proposed by the plaintiff, however, the class presented problems of adequacy of representation and class definition, since every arrestee (including Maneely) would require a hearing on the circumstances of his or her arrest to establish that the search was without cause and demonstrate membership in the class.¹³⁸ Rather than simply deny certification of the proposed action, however, the court exercised its discretion to certify a different class: "I am not going to certify the class Maneely seeks to represent. Instead, I am going to certify a broader class, but on a narrower issue . . ."¹³⁹ The judge employed the provision for class actions "with respect to particular issues"¹⁴⁰ to certify a class "as to the issue of whether the City of Newburgh maintained a policy of strip searching all pre-arrangement prisoners, with or without having reasonable suspicion to believe that these persons were carrying or concealing weapons or contraband," on behalf of "all persons who were strip searched before arraignment" within a specified time period.¹⁴¹ If the class prevailed, she explained, arrestees could then assert their damages claims in individual suits.¹⁴²

Judge Shelby Highsmith of the Southern District of Florida also used an aggressive reformulation in a suit challenging GEICO's practice of only reimbursing insured claimants for a portion of their deductible when GEICO succeeded in securing only a portion of the requested recovery from the adverse insurer.¹⁴³ Plaintiff Rosemary Powers sought to recover damages under Rule 23(b)(3) on behalf of a nationwide class, but the court found that differences in applicable state law created serious predominance problems and that the plaintiff failed to demonstrate that those problems could be overcome.¹⁴⁴ Acting on its own, however, the court did find that a statewide class would pass muster, and it certified that class sua sponte:

¹³⁶ Id.

¹³⁷ Id. at 70-71.

¹³⁸ See id. at 76 ("No person could become a member of the class [the plaintiff] proposes to represent . . . until it was determined there was no reasonable suspicion for a search in his individual case.").

¹³⁹ Id.

¹⁴⁰ That provision is currently codified at FED. R. CIV. P. 23(c)(4). It was Rule 23(c)(4)(A) in the version of the Rule that Judge McMahon was employing. Maneely, 208 F.R.D. at 78.

¹⁴¹ Maneely, 208 F.R.D. at 78.

¹⁴² Id. at 79.

¹⁴³ See Powers v. Gov't Emps. Ins. Co., 192 F.R.D. 313, 315 (S.D. Fla. 1998) (describing GEICO's reimbursement policy).

¹⁴⁴ Id. at 318-19.

"Powers has not proposed any alternative classes. However, this Court finds that certification of a class comprised of Geico insureds from the State of Florida satisfies all of the requisite elements for certification."¹⁴⁵ The court granted the motion for class certification, but on terms substantially different from those proposed by plaintiff.¹⁴⁶

Judge John Nixon of the Middle District of Tennessee claimed a similar authority when adjudicating a request for class certification in Craft v. Vanderbilt University, a case involving allegations of improper medical experimentation upon pregnant women.¹⁴⁷ Concluding that the class as proposed would exhibit serious manageability problems, Judge Nixon emphasized his "broad discretion in determining whether an action should be certified as a class action."¹⁴⁸ This discretion encompassed a power "to modify or reformulate existing classes in the interest of manageability or other factors bearing upon class appropriateness."¹⁴⁹ He thus decertified the offending portion of the class and replaced it with an individually administered rebuttable presumption for the affected claimants, a mechanism that he believed was indicated by the underlying substantive law.¹⁵⁰

And in a Title VII action against Wal-Mart alleging racial discrimination against applicants for truck driving positions, Nelson v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.,¹⁵¹ Judge Billy Roy Wilson determined that he should not certify a class that included punitive damage claims for fear that res judicata might foreclose compensatory damage claims that individual drivers might wish to pursue, potentially compromising the required commonality of interest among class members.¹⁵² Rather than refuse certification altogether, Judge Wilson acted on his own to sever punitive damages from the class proposal and certify "a class only on the issues of classwide liability and declaratory and equitable relief."¹⁵³

¹⁴⁵ Id. at 320.

¹⁴⁶ Id.

¹⁴⁷ 174 F.R.D. 396, 400-01 (M.D. Tenn. 1996).

¹⁴⁸ Id. at 403.

¹⁴⁹ Id.

¹⁵⁰ Id. at 403-04.

¹⁵¹ 245 F.R.D. 358 (E.D. Ark. 2007).

¹⁵² Id. at 372-73 (citing Samuel Issacharoff, Preclusion, Due Process, and the Right to Opt Out of Class Actions, 77 NOTRE DAME L. REV. 1057, 1078 (2002)) (noting that claims for punitive damages, but not compensatory damages, would likely be barred in subsequent litigation). For a treatment of this species of res judicata concern, see generally Tobias Barrington Wolff, Preclusion in Class Action Litigation, 105 COLUM. L. REV. 717 (2005).

¹⁵³ Nelson, 245 F.R.D. at 373 (citing FED. R. CIV. P. 23(c)(4)(A) (current version at FED. R. CIV. P. 23(c)(4))).

Several themes emerge from the body of practice exemplified by these cases involving judicial reformulation of the class definition. First, the discretionary power that federal courts possess to reshape the boundaries and composition of the class is continuous with their power to decide whether to certify at all. Some courts explicitly draw that connection in describing their authority over class definition,¹⁵⁴ and it is a connection necessitated by the practical impact of this form of class management. To restructure a proposed nationwide class into a statewide proceeding, or to refocus the class definition onto a different aspect of the plaintiff's claim, is to change the nature of the proceeding qualitatively. When the plaintiff proposes a class that the court determines cannot be certified, the court has the option of simply refusing. When, instead, the court elects to redefine the class in the ways explored above, that action entails a determination that reformulating the class will better serve the purposes of Rule 23 and the underlying policies of the substantive law than would denying certification altogether. In making that determination, the court issues a discretionary decision as to whether or not a class action should occur.

A second theme is closely related: In cases involving class definition, federal courts view proposed class actions as embodying a significant element of public trust. When a plaintiff and her attorney file a lawsuit seeking to represent a class of people they do not know, it is not their sole prerogative to set the terms on which they will pursue claims on behalf of the class. Rather, they embark upon a representation the nature and terms of which may have to be set by the court.¹⁵⁵ In theory, a named plaintiff could insist upon withdrawing as the class representative when a proceeding is reshaped in ways that she disapproves, but that kind of protest would be self-defeating in most cases, and the ethical responsibilities of class counsel might foreclose such self-regarding caprice.¹⁵⁶ It is not the prerogative of representative plaintiffs or class counsel to adopt a “my way or the highway” attitude toward a class proceeding. Rather, by filing a proposed class action, plaintiffs and their lawyers initiate a dialogue with the court in which their proposals and preferences are measured against the express requirements and limitations of Rule 23 and balanced against the court’s determination regarding the best type of representative proceeding under the governing law.

¹⁵⁴ See id. at 365, 373 (framing its power in the certification process by explaining that “[t]he decision whether to certify a class action is left to the sound discretion of the district court” and then severing a portion of the proposed class rather than denying certification altogether).

¹⁵⁵ The Second Circuit made a similar observation in an early decision concerning attorney's fees under modern Rule 23. In Alpine Pharmacy, Inc. v. Chas. Pfizer & Co., 481 F.2d 1045, 1050 (2d Cir. 1973), the court explained that a class action does not proceed “through simple operation of the private enterprise system”; rather, “both the class determination and designation of counsel as class representative come through judicial determinations, and the attorney so benefited serves in something of a position of public trust.” Several other courts have pointed to this statement by the Second Circuit in describing the particular nature of the ethical and professional duties that class counsel bear in a representative proceeding. See, e.g., Stewart v. Gen. Motors Corp., 756 F.2d 1285, 1294 n.5 (7th Cir. 1985) (“We judges can certainly appreciate that there are times when a public trust resembles indentured servitude, but we are rarely able to alter that situation.”).

¹⁵⁶ See FED. R. CIV. P. 23(g)(4) (stating that class counsel has a duty to fairly and adequately represent the interests of the class); MODEL RULES OF PROF'L CONDUCT R. 1.16(b)(1) (2013)

Third, federal courts have not been limited to the express provisions of Rule 23 when exercising their discretion to alter the scope or definition of a proposed class. Their discretion is not unbounded, of course, and courts frequently employ the underlying substantive law to guide them in deciding questions of definition and scope in class certification, as in the Craft and Nelson decisions above. But the text of the Rule does not purport to enumerate all the factors that a court might consider in making these determinations. Thus, in Yamasaki, the Supreme Court recognized the authority of a court to consider systemic impact when entertaining a proposed injunctive proceeding. That species of concern is expressly authorized for damages actions in the superiority requirement of Rule 23(b)(3) but is not specified in section (b)(2). Even so, the Yamasaki Court acknowledged systemic impact as an appropriate extra-textual consideration.

D. Discretion Not to Certify

The discretion not to certify a class—to exercise judgment in deciding whether aggregate treatment is appropriate at all, even if the requirements of Rule 23 are satisfied—is the most consequential form of control that a federal court can exercise in a putative class action proceeding. With the elimination of the conditional certification provision from Rule 23(c)(3)(C) and the Court’s recent emphasis on the need for a “rigorous analysis” prior to certification,¹⁵⁷ a court has minimal power to authorize class certification outside the clear boundaries of Rule 23’s text. In contrast, the discretion not to certify has formed a significant part of the class action jurisprudence of the federal courts since the enactment of the 1966 revisions to Rule 23. It has found expression in highly influential rulings by the lower federal courts and enjoyed a partial imprimatur from the Supreme Court itself. Some rulings have lodged the discretion not to certify in the superiority requirement for cases filed under Rule 23(b)(3) or in the tradition of discretionary (limiting ability of counsel to withdraw from representation where doing so would impose a “material adverse effect on the interests of the client”).

¹⁵⁷ See Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. 2541, 2551-52 (2011) (“[C]ertification is proper only if the trial court is satisfied, after a rigorous analysis, that the prerequisites of Rule 23 have been satisfied . . .” (internal quotation marks omitted)).

control over equitable relief in (b)(2) actions. Others have not felt the need for such textual positioning, instead relying directly upon the discretion inherent in Rule 23. In many of these cases, courts have based their judgments upon an assessment of the underlying law and the impact that a class action would have upon substantive policies. But courts have also exercised the discretion not to certify in response to litigation dynamics not specifically tied to any substantive legal regime.

The first major ruling to explore substantive law reasons for exercising discretion not to certify, and the most influential opinion of its kind for some years, was Judge Marvin Frankel's decision in *Ratner v. Chemical Bank New York Trust Co.*¹⁵⁸ The defendant in Ratner had failed to include a required disclosure on an initial credit card statement concerning the annual percentage rate of interest, and a cardholder brought suit under the TILA seeking to represent 130,000 others under Rule 23(b)(3) and claiming statutory damages of at least $100 per person.¹⁵⁹ The violation was technical in nature—the company had disclosed the rate in other communications, provided the required disclosure on subsequent credit card statements, and corrected the omission on the initial statement when made aware of it.¹⁶⁰ The initial omission was still a violation of the clear terms of the TILA, however, and entitled the plaintiff to summary judgment on the merits.¹⁶¹ The case also seemed particularly well-suited to class treatment: the omission was identical for all cardholders, there was no requirement to show individual reliance, and the statutory damages provision eliminated any need for individual proof of harm. Many other district courts had previously certified classes in similar TILA disputes.¹⁶²

Judge Frankel denied the request to certify the class in a brief opinion that began with the following summary of reasons:

- (1) there is no affirmative need or justification for such a proceeding in the actual circumstances of the case; and
- (2) the allowance of thousands of minimum recoveries like plaintiff's would carry to an absurd and stultifying extreme the specific and essentially ¹⁵⁸ Ratner v. Chem. Bank N.Y. Trust Co., 54 F.R.D. 412 (S.D.N.Y. 1972).

¹⁵⁹ Id. at 413-14.

¹⁶⁰ Id. at 414, 416.

¹⁶¹ Judge Frankel addressed the merits at length in a separate reported opinion, Ratner v. Chemical Bank New York Trust Co., 329 F. Supp. 270, 282 (S.D.N.Y. 1971), granting summary judgment to the individual plaintiff on the merits.

¹⁶² See infra note 171 and accompanying text.

inconsistent remedy Congress prescribed as the means of private enforcement.¹⁶³

The “broad and open-ended terms” of the newly revised Rule called for “the exercise of some considerable discretion of a pragmatic nature” in making certification determinations, the court continued, and permitting a massive class-wide remedy for technical violations that had already been corrected would impose “horrendous, possibly annihilating punishment, unrelated to any damage to the purported class or to any benefit to defendant,” a result that would be inconsistent with Congress’s purpose in enacting the TILA.¹⁶⁴ Invoking the superiority requirement (albeit as something of an after-thought), Judge Frankel declined the request for certification and instead entered judgment on Ratner’s individual claim.¹⁶⁵

Ratner had a dramatic impact on TILA litigation and subsequent legislative developments. In one illustrative 1973 case, Wilcox v. Commerce Bank of Kansas City, the Tenth Circuit affirmed a district court’s denial of class certification in a TILA case involving a broader set of alleged failures to disclose required information in credit card statements, with a total potential liability of over one billion dollars.¹⁶⁶ Relying on Judge Frankel’s opinion, the court of appeals rejected the proposition that class actions must be available either always or never for TILA violations. Instead, it authorized a discretionary approach “in view of a congressional confidence in case by case determinations” about the propriety of class certification “by qualified and informed trial judges with a wide general discretion and specific leeway under Rule 23 itself to avoid inferior, unfair or senseless applications” of the statute.¹⁶⁷ A report of the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs concerning the amendments to the TILA enacted in 1974 described Ratner as the “leading case” on TILA class actions and quantified its impact:

Prior to the Ratner decision on February 14, 1972, the courts affirmed 8 Truth in Lending suits as class actions while denying class action status to 3. Since the Ratner case, the courts denied 21 Truth in Lending suits class action status while affirming only one and in that case, only after the plaintiffs amended their complaint to sue only for actual damages.¹⁶⁸

¹⁶³ Ratner, 54 F.R.D. at 414.

¹⁶⁴ Id. at 416.

¹⁶⁵ Id.

¹⁶⁶ 474 F.2d 336, 340, 349 (10th Cir. 1973).

¹⁶⁷ Id. at 344.

¹⁶⁸ S. REP. NO. 93-278, at 14 (1973) (Conf. Rep.) (italics added).

The amendments responded to Ratner's use of trial court discretion to avoid industry-destroying liability by imposing a statutory cap of $100,000 on total classwide damages in order to remove the crushing potential of classwide liability and preserve the feasibility of class remedies for private enforcement.¹⁶⁹ Further amendments in 1976 raised the damages cap to $500,000 to ensure that private enforcement would remain a financially viable mechanism for plaintiffs' lawyers.¹⁷⁰ The discretion not to certify that Judge Frankel and others exercised in the early TILA cases did not provoke a congressional rebuke; rather, it initiated a dialogue with Congress that preserved the private remedy under the statute while reducing the need for courts to apply a safety valve.¹⁷¹

The TILA cases were the first major occasion where the lower federal courts systematically exercised discretion not to certify under modern Rule 23, but they are not singular. Courts have exercised that prerogative in a range of substantive contexts since the 1966 revisions. In some cases, courts have grounded the decision to deny certification on an assessment of the impact that class treatment would have upon the specific policies reflected in the law underlying the dispute, as in Ratner and its progeny. In others, like the widely cited opinion of Judge Posner in In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc.,¹⁷² courts have identified the potential impact of class certification on shared social policies as a basis for exercising discretion in deciding when class certification is advisable without tying their analysis to any particular substantive legal regime. And in still others, courts have invoked institutional principles not directly linked to substantive policy, particularly in cases involving government defendants in which the class device is invoked

¹⁶⁹ See id. at 14–15 (noting that the purpose of TILA's civil penalties section "was to provide creditors with a meaningful incentive to comply with the law" but that this purpose could "be achieved without subjecting creditors to enormous penalties").

¹⁷⁰ The report of the Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs regarding the 1976 amendments described the purpose of the increased statutory cap in the following terms:

The Committee wishes to avoid any implication that the ceiling on class action recovery is meant to discourage use of the class action device. The recommended $500,000 limit, coupled with the 1% formula, provides, we believe, a workable structure for private enforcement. Small businesses are protected by the 1% measure, while a potential half million dollar recovery ought to act as a significant deterrent to even the largest creditor.

S. REP. NO. 94-590, at 8 (1976) (Conf. Rep.).

¹⁷¹ Although the need to apply a safety valve was reduced, it was not eliminated: some district courts continued to exercise discretion not to certify in TILA cases following the 1974 and 1976 amendments in cases where they believed that the purposes of the remedy would be subverted by class treatment. These decisions sometimes received deferential treatment from the courts of appeals. See, e.g., Watkins v. Simmons & Clark, Inc., 618 F.2d 398, 404 (6th Cir. 1980) (holding class certification may be denied even in cases involving only technical violations).

¹⁷² 51 F.3d 1293 (7th Cir. 1995).

primarily as a tool for ensuring broad compliance. The range is broad and the record deep.

The Supreme Court of the United States has never issued a major holding on the discretion not to certify, but the Court has assumed and relied upon the existence of such discretion. In Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., the Supreme Court confronted an antitrust question regarding the availability of treble damages in consumer lawsuits.¹⁷³ The case involved allegations of price fixing in the market for hearing aids that increased the cost of the product, and the plaintiff, a consumer, sought treble damages on behalf of all retail purchasers of the affected devices.¹⁷⁴ The appellate court held that treble damages were unavailable because an individual consumer was not injured in her “business or property” by anticompetitive behavior (a requirement under the statute),¹⁷⁵ but the Supreme Court reversed, finding that “the word ‘property’ has a naturally broad and inclusive meaning” that necessarily includes a consumer’s loss of money when paying inflated prices for goods.¹⁷⁶ The defendants protested that making treble damages available in consumer class actions would “have a potentially ruinous effect on small businesses in particular and will ultimately be paid by consumers in any event,” urging the Court to find the remedy wholly unavailable in that category of cases.¹⁷⁷ The Court acknowledged the importance of these concerns but found that the “plain language” of the Clayton Act precluded a holding that consumers were ineligible for treble damages.¹⁷⁸ Nevertheless, as in Yamasaki—which was heard in the same Term and handed down nine days after Reiter—the Court went on to opine on the important systemic role of federal court discretion in potentially troublesome categories of class proceeding:

District courts must be especially alert to identify frivolous claims brought to extort nuisance settlements; they have broad power and discretion vested in them by Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 23 with respect to matters involving the certification and management of potentially cumbersome or frivolous class actions. Recognition of the plain meaning of the statutory language “business or property” need not result in administrative chaos, class-action harassment, ¹⁷³ 442 U.S. 330, 335 (1979).

¹⁷⁴ Id.

¹⁷⁵ Id. at 336.

¹⁷⁶ Id. at 338-39, 345.

¹⁷⁷ Id. at 344-45.

¹⁷⁸ Id. at 345.

or “windfall” settlements if the district courts exercise sound discretion and use the tools available.¹⁷⁹

Treble damages in consumer claims need not produce extortion, the Reiter Court concluded, because frivolous claimants could be prevented from obtaining windfall class settlements through the “broad power and discretion” that the district court possesses to decide whether and under what conditions to certify a class.¹⁸⁰ Judge Friendly drew upon this passage in Abrams when describing the nature of federal court discretion in a consumer class action alleging price fixing,¹⁸¹ and lower courts have drawn upon Reiter when exploring the meaning and application of this discretionary mechanism of control in a variety of cases, many (though not all) involving antitrust disputes.¹⁸²

¹⁷⁹ Id. (citations omitted). Reiter postdates by five years the Court’s ruling in Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacqueline, 417 U.S. 156 (1974). The Reiter Court apparently deemed it obvious that a district court had discretion to determine whether certification was appropriate where the plaintiff’s claims appeared “frivolous,” id. at 345, a proposition at odds with the received account of Eisen as a case prohibiting district courts from basing certification decisions on an initial assessment of the merits. See In re Hydrogen Peroxide Antitrust Litig., 552 F.3d 305, 316-17 (3d Cir. 2008) (highlighting and rejecting this received account of Eisen). Eisen’s actual holding was that the district court abused its discretion when it imposed the costs of notice upon the defendant based upon a positive assessment of the merits of the plaintiffs’ claims, a procedure that “allow[s] a representative plaintiff to secure the benefits of a class action without first satisfying the requirements for it.” 417 U.S. at 177. The Eisen Court introduced that holding with the broadly worded sentence, now notorious, that “nothing in either the language or history of Rule 23 [] gives a court any authority to conduct a preliminary inquiry into the merits of a suit in order to determine whether it may be maintained as a class action.” Id. The Court has since clarified the limited significance of that language. See Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. 2541, 2551-52 (2011) (noting that rigorous analysis of certification may entail some overlap with the merits).

¹⁸⁰ Reiter, 442 U.S. at 345.

¹⁸¹ See Abrams v. Interco Inc., 719 F.2d 23, 29 (2d Cir. 1983) (“[T]he Court [in Reiter] emphasized the broad power and discretion vested in the courts by Fed. R. Civ. P. 23”).

¹⁸² See, e.g., In re Datapoint Corp., 1996 WL 673320, at *2 (Fed. Cir. Nov. 14, 1996) (relying upon Reiter to grant a district court broad leeway to decline to certify until and unless it has a high level of confidence that certification of a novel defendant class would be appropriate); Greenhaw v. Lubbock Cnty. Beverage Ass’n, 721 F.2d 1019, 1024 (5th Cir. 1983) (recognizing Reiter’s invitation to deny certification in cases involving “frivolous and unmeritorious” claims but affirming the district court in rejecting the argument that denial of certification is warranted solely because class counsel will receive greater compensation than any individual class member), overruled on other grounds by Int’l Woodworkers of Am. v. Champion Int’l Corp., 790 F.2d 1174, 1181 n.8 (5th Cir. 1986); Marks v. S.F. Real Estate Bd., 627 F.2d 947, 951 (9th Cir. 1980) (opinion of Larson, J.) (citing the language regarding discretion in Reiter as a negative example to the case before him, a consumer antitrust case where defendants argued that the extent of their liability exposure counseled against certification of a class).

Justice Breyer also draws upon Reiter in his separate opinions in both Amchem and Ortiz, although he cites the case out of context, offering Reiter as support for an expansive account of a district court’s discretion to certify in cases requiring experimentation, rather than as a basis for denying certification in cases calling for a safety valve. See Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corp., 527 U.S. 815,

The superiority requirement of Rule 23(b)(3) often serves as the doctrinal home for policy-driven determinations that certification is unwarranted. Indeed, in one price-fixing ruling that predated Reiter by several years, Rutledge v. Electric Hose & Rubber Co., the Ninth Circuit affirmed a district court's denial of class certification on superiority grounds, with a brief discussion that identified superiority determinations as lying "in an area where the trial court's discretion is paramount."¹⁸³ But courts have exercised this authority in non-(b)(3) actions as well. Consider King v. Kansas City Southern Industries, Inc., a decision by the Seventh Circuit in a securities action alleging violations of federal and state law in the merger of two investment advising entities.¹⁸⁴ One plaintiff sought to certify a class of shareholders under Rule 23(b)(1)(A), arguing that individual actions threatened to generate inconsistent adjudications.¹⁸⁵ The district court refused the certification request, in part due to concerns over the feasibility of notice to the class and manageability of the action, and in part based on its conclusion that an alternative method of relief was available that would better serve the policies underlying the securities laws.¹⁸⁶ The Seventh Circuit affirmed, holding that determinations regarding what "procedure would further the policies underlying [the substantive law]" were an appropriate basis for denying certification and that "[d]etermination of the manageability" of a proposed action is "a matter for the trial court's discretion" in "all class actions," not just actions brought under subsection (b)(3).¹⁸⁷ The district court's decision to refuse a class action in deference to a direct action by the injured funds "was a practical decision within its discretion," the appellate court found, and its finding that "a class action would not best further the underlying policies" in the dispute fell within the proper bounds of its discretion.¹⁸⁸ Throughout the opinion, the Seventh Circuit based its account of the district court's discretion on general principles 868 (1999) (Breyer, J., dissenting) (invoking Reiter for the proposition that "district court[s] should be allowed] full authority to exercise every bit of discretionary power that the law provides"); Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 630 (1997) (Breyer, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (suggesting that district courts have broad power to certify class actions under Reiter because they are more familiar than the appellate courts with the issues).

¹⁸³ 511 F.2d 668, 673 (9th Cir. 1975).

¹⁸⁴ 519 F.2d 20, 23-24 (7th Cir. 1975).

¹⁸⁵ Id. at 25.

¹⁸⁶ See id. (discussing alternative of a direct action by the funds allegedly injured by the merger, possibly including intervention by individual shareholders).

¹⁸⁷ Id.

¹⁸⁸ Id. at 26-27.

of certification under Rule 23, rather than the particularities of any subsection of Rule 23(b).¹⁸⁹

And then there is Judge Posner's opinion for the Seventh Circuit in In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc., a nationwide class action brought against manufacturers of blood solid products for failing to guard adequately against the transmission of HIV to hemophiliacs.¹⁹⁰ After a period characterized by increasingly expansive applications of Rule 23 in personal injury and products liability cases, Rhone-Poulenc was the first of three cases—along with *In re American Medical Systems, Inc.*¹⁹¹ from the Sixth Circuit and *Castano v. American Tobacco Co.*¹⁹² from the Fifth Circuit—that marked a significant shift, employing extraordinary forms of review to reject broad classes that had been certified by district courts¹⁹³ and spurring the Civil Rules Committee to amend Rule 23 in 1998 by adding a provision for immediate appeal of class certification rulings when deemed appropriate by the circuit courts.¹⁹⁴

The primary basis that Judge Posner offered for rejecting the district court's certification order through the extraordinary device of mandamus intervention related to the immature nature of the tort claim at issue. Certification of a nationwide class would have forced the defendants to "stake their companies on the outcome of a single jury trial" in a claim that had not yet been tested through "a decentralized process of multiple trials, involving different juries, and different standards of liability"—a way of proceeding that threatened to impose overwhelming pressure to settle even when the defendant is confident on the merits.¹⁹⁵ The majority acknowledged ¹⁸⁹ The en banc Third Circuit conducted a similar analysis in one of the early TILA cases. In Katz v. Carte Blanche Corp., the court reversed a district court's certification of a TILA case and recounted the potential for serious adverse consequences to the defendant if notice was issued to the class regarding a claim of "doubtful validity." 496 F.2d 747, 757-58 (3d Cir. 1974) (en banc). In examining the alternative remedies available to claimants, the court described the role that stare decisis and non-mutual offensive issue preclusion might play in empowering cardholders to establish liability and found that "it is hardly fair to say that the judicial system must insist on res judicata [through class certification] rather than collateral estoppel or stare decisis." Id. at 760.

¹⁹⁰ 51 F.3d 1293, 1296-97 (7th Cir. 1995).

¹⁹¹ 75 F.3d 1069 (6th Cir. 1996).

¹⁹² 84 F.3d 734 (5th Cir. 1996).

¹⁹³ AMS and Rhone-Poulenc employed mandamus to conduct their review. See AMS, 75 F.3d at 1074; Rhone-Poulenc, 51 F.3d at 1294. Castano came up by way of a certified interlocutory appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b). See 84 F.3d at 737.

¹⁹⁴ See FED. R. CIV. P. 23(f) (permitting immediate appeal from the grant or denial of class certification if accepted by the court of appeals); FED. R. CIV. P. 23(f) advisory committee's note to the 1998 amendments (describing the change).

¹⁹⁵ Rhone-Poulenc, 51 F.3d at 1299. But see Samuel Issacharoff, Assembling Class Actions, 90 WASH. U. L. REV. 699, 710 & n.57 (2013) (discussing the "blackmail effect" described by Judge Posner and noting disagreement about the magnitude of the problem in modern class litigation).

"the district judge's commendable desire to experiment with an innovative procedure for streamlining the adjudication of th[e] mass tort,"¹⁹⁶ but it found that the use of a centralized nationwide class action in an immature tort case where claims were capable of being litigated on an individual basis, coupled with problems in the definition of the liability standard and the disaggregation of common and individual issues, rendered the certification order an abuse of discretion even on the extraordinarily deferential standards of mandamus review.¹⁹⁷

Judge Posner wrote in Rhone-Poulenc as though his analysis was largely sui generis, but his opinion is of a piece with the antitrust and securities rulings described above: an exercise of judicial discretion declining to certify a broad class action on the basis of a conclusion that aggregate litigation would undermine important substantive policy values. Rhone-Poulenc is not as careful as some of those earlier precedents in identifying the specific source of the substantive policies that counsel against class treatment. Judge Posner invokes general concerns regarding premature comprehensive adjudication of novel liability questions without ascribing those concerns to any particular body of state law,¹⁹⁸ and the extraordinary posture of mandamus review raises important questions about the propriety of the majority's action. But in other respects, Rhone-Poulenc is quite similar to earlier rulings that denied class certification to avoid undermining substantive law. As in Kansas City Southern Industries, the majority in Rhone-Poulenc operated outside the scope of the superiority requirement when it ruled that individual actions would better serve the tort policies implicated in the case than would a broad class proceeding, a mode of analysis that traces back to Ratner and the TILA cases.¹⁹⁹ And in acknowledging the proper role of experimentation in the aggregate treatment of novel claims along with the necessary limits upon such experimentation, the court joined a conversation that began in the earliest post-1966 class action rulings and that eventually produced such reforms as the 2003 amendments to Rule 23 that eliminated

¹⁹⁶ Rhone-Poulenc, 51 F.3d at 1297 (internal quotation marks omitted).

¹⁹⁷ Id. at 1304.

¹⁹⁸ See Stephen B. Burbank & Tobias Barrington Wolff, Redeeming the Missed Opportunities of Shady Grove, 159 U. PA. L. REV. 17, 67-68 (2010) (describing Judge Posner's assertions about "the danger of adjudicating an immature tort in a nationwide class action" as "incomplete").

¹⁹⁹ The district judge in Rhone-Poulenc had proceeded exclusively on the authority of Rule 23(c)(4) to certify a class "with respect to particular issues" and the Seventh Circuit never cites or discusses the superiority provision in its analysis. 51 F.3d at 1297. Judge Rovner, in dissent, criticized the majority for this feature of its analysis, calling instead for a strict account of judicial discretion in the certification decision limited to factors expressly authorized by the Rule. Id. at 1307-08 (Rovner, J., dissenting).

conditional certification.²⁰⁰ Judge Posner's opinion has played a larger role than some of those earlier precedents in shaping later discussions about substantive law and the discretion not to certify, but it did not originate those discussions.

The discretion not to certify also finds expression in cases where the district court's reasons for skepticism over the propriety of a class proceeding relate to broader litigation dynamics rather than specific substantive policies. The Fourth Circuit has offered one of the strongest statements of the discretion not to certify in this mode. In Lowery v. Circuit City Stores, Inc., the appellate court affirmed the decision of a district court to decertify a Title VII pattern and practice claim that alleged racial discrimination against African-American workers at the Virginia headquarters of a major retailer.²⁰¹ After initially finding that the requirements of Rule 23 were satisfied and certifying the class, the trial court concluded that class treatment of the particular claims before it would be inefficient, unmanageable, and cumbersome.²⁰² It also developed concerns that the plaintiffs' proposal to try the question of punitive damages on a classwide basis before conducting individual hearings on actual harm, compensatory damages, and employee-specific defenses could result in an overestimation of the egregiousness of defendant's conduct and hence an excessive damages award.²⁰³ Efficiency and a fair estimation of damages are not enumerated as specific considerations in Rule 23(b)(2), under which the plaintiffs were proceeding,²⁰⁴ but the Fourth Circuit insisted upon the prerogative of district courts to factor such concerns into the certification decision nonetheless:

Rule 23 states that an action "may" be maintained as a class action if the listed requirements are met. The Rule does not say that, once the requirements are met, the district court "must" certify and maintain the suit as a class action. . . . [W]e have previously held that district courts have broad discretion in deciding whether to certify a class. This broad discretion necessarily ²⁰⁰ See supra Section II.A.

²⁰¹ 158 F.3d 742, 753-54, 768 (4th Cir. 1998), vacated, 527 U.S. 1031 (1999), aff'd in pertinent part, 206 F.3d 431 (4th Cir. 2000).

²⁰² Id. at 753-54.

²⁰³ Id. at 758-59.

²⁰⁴ The Fourth Circuit noted that such concerns might fairly be comprised within the (b)(3) factors relating to superiority and, while disclaiming any intent to import those factors wholesale into subsection (b)(2), held "that in appropriate circumstances a district court may exercise its discretion to deny certification if the resulting class action would be unmanageable or cumbersome." Id. at 758 n.5.

The use of Rule 23(b)(2) in an action seeking broad punitive and compensatory damages does not survive the Court's decision in Dukes. See 131 S. Ct. 2541, 2557 (2011) (holding that claims for individualized monetary relief are not appropriate for certification under subsection (b)(2)).

implies that the district court may appropriately consider factors other than those listed in Rule 23 in determining whether to certify a class action. . . . [T]he district court has such broad discretion to certify a class because it is intimately familiar with such practical and factual intricacies of the suit.²⁰⁵

I have not discovered a judicial interpretation of the permissive language of Rule 23 that more directly calls into question the Court's apparent treatment of the issue in Shady Grove than this one. The substance of the Lowery court's interpretation, however, represents the dominant sentiment among the lower federal courts throughout the post-1966 period. Similarly, lower federal courts have regularly claimed discretion to deny certification in cases involving uncertainty over the enumerated requirements of Rule 23 when their analysis produces indeterminate results and requires the exercise of judgment about the workability of a class proceeding. Thus, cases where the parameters of a class definition are "inherently nonspecific" and leave doubt about the ascertainability of class membership have led courts to claim broad discretion in denying class certification—one among many possible examples.²⁰⁶

Litigation against government officials has also produced a line of cases that assert a distinct justification for judicial discretion to deny class certification despite a complaint's seeming compliance with the provisions of Rule 23. In cases involving requests for injunctive relief against government defendants, the proposition that a class action might be an unnecessary form of relief has been formally adopted by a number of federal circuits as a basis for denying class treatment, often under the rubric of a "necessity requirement." The doctrine has its origin in another influential ruling by Judge Friendly in Galvan v. Levine, a case involving a New York policy that targeted workers of Puerto Rican origin for the denial of unemployment benefits.²⁰⁷ A three-judge panel tried the claims of two individual Puerto Rican plaintiffs, found the challenged policy unconstitutional, and enjoined its further enforcement, a result that the state accepted.²⁰⁸ The panel denied the plaintiffs' request to certify a class on behalf of all similarly affected ²⁰⁵ Lowery, 158 F.3d at 757-58 (citations omitted).

²⁰⁶ See Miller v. Krawczyk, 414 F. Supp. 998, 1000 (E.D. Wis. 1976) (denying certification of a class purporting to represent employees "who presently reside or desire to reside outside of Milwaukee County" in challenging a residency requirement for civil service employment); see also 7AA CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT ET AL., FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 1785 (3d ed. 2005 & Supp. 2013) (collecting cases regarding determinations whether class actions should be certified).

²⁰⁷ 490 F.2d 1255, 1257 (2d Cir. 1973).

²⁰⁸ Id. at 1260.

workers, however, and the plaintiffs appealed from that denial.²⁰⁹ The Second Circuit affirmed and suggested that class certification was generally unnecessary in cases involving facial constitutional challenges to government policies:

[I]nsofar as the relief sought is prohibitory, an action seeking declaratory or injunctive relief against state officials on the ground of unconstitutionality of a statute or administrative practice is the archetype of one where class action designation is largely a formality, at least for the plaintiffs. . . . [W]hat is important in such a case for the plaintiffs or, more accurately, for their counsel, is that the judgment run to the benefit not only of the named plaintiffs but of all others similarly situated, as the judgment did here. The State has made clear that it understands the judgment to bind it with respect to all claimants; indeed even before entry of the judgment, it withdrew the challenged policy even more fully than the court ultimately directed and stated it did not intend to reinstate the policy.²¹⁰

A number of other circuits have adopted some version of this necessity requirement, but most have emphasized that the doctrine is discretionary—not automatic—and must be administered with careful attention to the enforcement dynamics of particular disputes.²¹¹ There have been occasions when lower federal courts have denied class treatment in such cases and government officials have then failed to come into general compliance after losing on the merits, justifying the certification of a broad remedial class in subsequent proceedings.²¹²

²⁰⁹ Id.

²¹⁰ Id. at 1261 (citations omitted).

²¹¹ See, e.g., Dionne v. Bouley, 757 F.2d 1344, 1356 (1st Cir. 1985) (recognizing the discretion of federal courts to “deny Rule 23(b)(2) certification where it is a formality or otherwise inappropriate” but emphasizing the need for attention to “situations where a class certification under Rule 23(b)(2) will arguably be unnecessary, but where other considerations may render a denial of certification improper”); Duprey v. Conn. Dep’t of Motor Vehicles, 191 F.R.D. 329, 339 (D. Conn. 2000) (explaining that “whether to apply the necessity doctrine is a matter committed to the sound discretion of the district court” and finding that a defendant’s refusal to concede the commonality and typicality of the class claims indicates a likelihood that the defendant will resist voluntary compliance militating in favor of class certification if otherwise appropriate).

²¹² For example, in Bermudez v. U.S. Department of Agriculture, plaintiffs challenged the federal food stamp program’s refusal to provide retroactive adjustments to welfare recipients whose benefits were found to have been wrongfully withheld. 490 F.2d 718, 719-20 (D.C. Cir. 1973). Earlier suits challenging the same policy had been initiated in other courts, which had denied nationwide class treatment on the strength of the assumptions that “the federal government would voluntarily rescind the policy” and that “the precedential value of the judgment would make a class action unnecessary.” Id. at 724. “Neither of these hopes [was] fulfilled,” so the district court in Bermudez determined that class relief had become necessary, and the court of appeals affirmed. Id. at 724-25.

As with many of the cases involving the discretion not to certify, courts vary in the textual justifications they offer, if any, for this necessity doctrine. Thus, the First Circuit has explained that it “prefer[s] not to speak of a ‘necessity requirement.’”²¹³ Instead, it has adopted a reading of Rule 23(b)(2)’s language requiring injunctive relief that is “appropriate respecting the class as a whole”²¹⁴ to mean that a classwide injunction is not “appropriate” when it appears unnecessary to achieve broad remedial compliance.²¹⁵ In contrast, Judge Leon of the D.C. District Court recently disclaimed any need for specific textual justification in exercising the discretion not to certify in a suit against a government defendant, explaining that “[e]ven though the proposed classes satisfy the eligibility criteria in Rule 23, the Court may nevertheless deny class certification based on other relevant considerations” and may “tak[e] account of factors not expressly delineated in Rule 23.”²¹⁶ The judge found this species of discretion to be particularly well-suited for facial constitutional challenges to government policies in which the court believes that a single decree will provide relief to all affected individuals.²¹⁷

Finally, some decisions have recognized discretion not to certify in damages actions where the remedial justification for a class action is unclear. One early influential case of this type, Kamm v. California City Development Co., involved a dispute in which investors claimed fraud by promoters of a real estate development scheme.²¹⁸ By the time the plaintiffs requested class certification, California public authorities had already initiated an enforcement proceeding against the developers in which they secured an injunction that prohibited further deceptive practices and negotiated a settlement requiring the defendants to offer restitution to injured parties.²¹⁹ Investors who chose to reject those offers of restitution could still pursue their claims, and the class representatives sought to advance these claims on an aggregate basis.²²⁰ The district court invoked the superiority requirement to deny the request for certification, finding that the alternative remedy available under the state settlement rendered it unnecessary to permit parties who rejected

²¹³ Dionne, 757 F.2d at 1356.

²¹⁴ FED. R. CIV. P. 23(b)(2) (emphasis added).

²¹⁵ Dionne, 757 F.2d at 1356.

²¹⁶ Mills v. Dist. of Columbia, 266 F.R.D. 20, 22 (D.D.C. 2010).

²¹⁷ See id. at 22-23 (“[T]he relief sought by the named plaintiffs by virtue of their facial challenge affords sufficient protection to the proposed class members . . . thereby making class certification in this particular context wholly unnecessary.”).

²¹⁸ 509 F.2d 205, 207 (9th Cir. 1975).

²¹⁹ Id. at 207-08.

²²⁰ Id. at 208.

the offer of restitution to pursue private remedies on an aggregate basis.²²¹ The Ninth Circuit found this ruling to be an appropriate exercise of discretion, emphasizing the “[s]ignificant relief” already realized by the investors and the likelihood that a class action would “duplicate and possibly to some extent negate” the work already undertaken in the state proceedings.²²² Kamm continues to be cited in discussions about the propriety of class certification of damages claims in the aftermath of regulatory enforcement proceedings.²²³

III. ANALYZING THE ROLE OF DISCRETION IN CLASS ACTION LITIGATION

My primary purpose in this Article is a descriptive one. The topic of discretion in class certification has received inadequate attention in the scholarly and judicial literature with no systematic account of the types of discretion that courts have actually exercised since the 1966 revisions to Rule 23. The overview and taxonomy that I set forth above is far from complete, but I believe that it provides a framework within which more useful analysis can develop.

My normative goals are more limited. The cases discussed above encompass a broad range of liability policies and litigation contexts, and it would require a dedicated and sustained treatment to advance any well-supported argument about the proper role of a court’s discretion in any one of them. That said, I am convinced that the judicial devices described throughout this Article must be available as potential tools in any successful system of class litigation. In this Part, I offer some further observations about the systemic nature of discretion in class certification: its inevitability in the administration of aggregate proceedings, and some of the elements of class action doctrine that can serve as counterweights to the exercise of discretion by lower federal courts. I also address the impact of Shady Grove on this system of discretion—an impact that is considerably more modest than the Court’s arresting language in that opinion might first lead one to assume.

221 Id. at 209.

222 Id. at 212.

223 See, e.g., In re Conseco Life Ins. Co. LifeTrend Ins. Sales & Mktg. Litig., 270 F.R.D. 521, 533 (N.D. Cal. 2010) (distinguishing Kamm in an injunctive class action presenting liability theories distinct from those pursued by regulators); Thornton v. State Farm Mut. Auto Ins. Co., 2006 WL 3359482, at *2 (N.D. Ohio Nov. 17, 2006) (citing Kamm in support of “the proposition that state relief coupled with an opportunity to bring individual claims is superior to a class action”); see also Doninger v. Pac. Nw. Bell, Inc., 564 F.2d 1304, 1307, 1314 (9th Cir. 1977) (affirming a district court’s denial of class certification in a Title VII action where an earlier consent decree offered a no-fault method of relief).

A. The System of Discretion Surrounding Class Certification

The forms of discretion explored in the previous Parts reveal several unsurprising truths regarding class action litigation. First, there is a significant amount of indeterminacy in the certification of class proceedings, and there are limitations on the ability of strictly defined rules to resolve this indeterminacy.²²⁴ Experimentation is inevitable when courts encounter a request for class certification in a new type of claim involving new types of proof.²²⁵ The discretion to limit the definition of a class to a core set of claims that are particularly well-suited to aggregate treatment, or to constrain the geographic scope of the class so as to limit the impact of certification in uncertain terrain, permits courts to develop a body of knowledge and practice over time from which they can make more confident decisions about certification.²²⁶ As the Tenth Circuit observed in Wilcox v. Commerce Bank of Kansas City, “it might be comforting to all of us in a way if each decision on review could clatter out of a slot brightly and clearly minted whenever governing symbols seemed to match, without the necessity of pondering over more imponderable but significant indications.”²²⁷ But that is not how complex cases usually operate.

Second, the introduction of class certification into a liability scheme can produce unforeseen consequences, and the general presumption that ²²⁴ Professor Kim makes a similar observation in her analysis of discretion among lower courts, admonishing quantitative analysts to engage with legal doctrine when seeking to measure judicial behavior. See Pauline T. Kim, Lower Court Discretion, 82 N.Y.U. L. REV. 383, 388 (2007) (“Despite the demand of hierarchical precedent, lower federal courts retain a substantial amount of discretion when deciding cases. . . . To some extent that discretion exists because it is unavoidable—legal language is at some point irredeemably indeterminate.”); see also H.L.A. HART, THE CONCEPT OF LAW 124 (1961) (arguing that legal rules “will, at some point where their application is in question, prove indeterminate; they will have what has been termed an open texture”).

²²⁵ The Fifth Circuit made this point in Castano when explaining its reason for rejecting a single nationwide class action for claims that the tobacco industry induced its customers to become dependent upon nicotine. See 84 F.3d 734, 749 (5th Cir. 1996) (“The primary procedural difficulty created by immature torts is the inherent difficulty a district court will have in determining whether the requirements of [R]ule 23 have been met.”).

Castano’s analysis of these issues can fairly be characterized as hostile toward the claimants. Indeed, “jeremiad” would be an apt term to describe the tenor of its analysis. The court seemed more interested in foreclosing a nationwide proceeding than in providing guidance for how smaller and more discretely defined class proceedings might fall within the proper bounds of a district court’s discretion, creating opportunities for experimentation with aggregate treatment of these novel claims.

²²⁶ See Friendly, supra note 13, at 771-73 (describing the value of allowing appellate courts to develop settled practice over time, and arguing for concomitantly greater appellate constraints on district court discretion in such cases).

²²⁷ 474 F.2d 336, 348 (10th Cir. 1973).

legislatures enact statutes against the backdrop of an existing procedural landscape is frequently an inadequate response. Indeed, in light of the robust tradition of discretion in class certification reflected in the cases discussed herein, such discretion may fairly be characterized as an established part of that procedural landscape. In cases where the statutory language allows it, the discretion not to certify can operate as a safety valve, permitting courts to explore the available avenues for relief in a series of cases from which they can determine when class treatment is appropriate and, conversely, when broad certification orders threaten to undermine the values sought to be promoted by the legislative scheme. As Professor Burbank and I have argued:

The history of Rule 23 . . . entails a seventy-year-long discussion of the deeply intertwined relationship between the procedural mechanism that enables aggregation of large numbers of claims for adjudication and the capacity of that mechanism to ossify certain liability rules (in the case of original Rule 23) or to catalyze innovation in the liability policies of the underlying law (in the case of the post-1966 version of the Rule, and particularly Rule 23(b)(3)).²²⁸

Almost fifty years of experience under modern Rule 23 has produced a now-unavoidable “awareness that in ‘procedure’ lurks power to alter or mask substantive results.”²²⁹ Discretion in class certification must be sufficiently capacious to address those substantive impacts in appropriate cases. Again the Tenth Circuit in Wilcox: “[O]ur whole system of justice is importantly geared to the balancing of judgment across variant and numerous circumstances by judges who must be entrusted[,] from the very difficulties of remote comparison and the superior perception of firsthand impression[,] to a wide discretion.”²³⁰

Third, the forms of discretion explored in the Sections above are interconnected. As Section II.C discusses, the power to control the definition or scope of a proposed class—a widely acknowledged and uncontroversial form of judicial control—is not qualitatively distinct from the discretion not to certify. Judge Friendly argued that the forms of procedural discretion that are most directly tied to matters of substantive policy may require the most invasive forms of appellate control, at least once the federal courts have acquired sufficient experience to have confidence in setting forth constraining rules.²³¹ But it is not possible to eliminate the more consequential forms of discretion in class certification altogether without threatening the pliability, and hence the viability, of the entire enterprise.

²²⁸ Burbank & Wolff, supra note 198, at 62; see also Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., 442 U.S. 330, 344–45 (1979) (identifying the protection of consumers as a primary purpose of the antitrust laws and a guiding principle in the certification of consumer class actions).

²²⁹ Burbank & Wolff, supra note 198, at 30.

²³⁰ 474 F.2d at 348.

There are dangers associated with robust judicial discretion. The type of trial court discretion that the Tenth Circuit approved in *Shook v. Board of County Commissioners of El Paso*²³² threatens a lack of uniformity in the treatment of requests for certification and an appearance of inconsistency in the rule of law. Discretion in matters with such immediate substantive implications can also turn into a platform for the advancement of policy preferences or the expression of judicial hostility toward particular substantive legal regimes. While the legal realist mindset would assume that the advancement of judicial preferences is unavoidable, discretion in class certification may present more acute dangers on that score.²³³ And insofar as the exercise of discretion aims to develop better information about the consequences of class certification in the face of indeterminacy, there is reason to question whether courts tend to overestimate their own expertise and, relatedly, whether the costs of indeterminacy should be addressed by politically accountable actors instead. Professor Bone has developed a general critique of procedural discretion along these lines, and while I

²³¹ See Friendly, supra note 18, at 758 (arguing that “broad appellate constraint is necessary” in cases with substantive policy implications “to preserve the most basic principle of jurisprudence” that “we must act alike in all cases of like nature”).

²³² 543 F.3d 597, 603-04 (10th Cir. 2008) (affirming a district court’s denial of certification in an institutional reform case for reasons bearing upon remedial policy and predominance, while also acknowledging that “other district courts perhaps could have chosen, or could choose, to certify similar classes”).

²³³ See, e.g., Katz v. Carte Blanche Corp., 496 F.2d 747, 764 (3d Cir. 1974) (en banc) (Seitz, C.J., dissenting) (“The unarticulated major premise of the majority decision is a distaste for class actions, at least in the present context [of a TILA dispute]. I do not believe such distaste, however widely shared, justifies judicial emasculation of Rule 23.”); Marcus, supra note 103, at 1606 (“The increasing vigor of the federal courts in tailoring the class action and other procedures to handle mass tort litigation has done little to disguise the substantive objective.” (footnote omitted)).

Professor Coffee has argued that trial judges are particularly prone to act from institutional self-interest, limiting the rights of parties in service of case management and docket clearing. See John C. Coffee, Jr., Class Wars: The Dilemma of the Mass Tort Class Action, 95 COLUM. L. REV. 1343, 1463 (1995) (“[T]he fact of judicial self-interest must be placed at center stage. . . . [T]he least acceptable reform proposals are those that simply increase the discretion of the trial judge. Given such discretion, the right to opt out would soon wither, and litigant autonomy might increasingly become a nostalgic memory.” (footnote omitted)).

disagree with his conclusions, the concerns that he identifies require serious attention.²³⁴

The alternative, however, is to adopt strictly defined rules that avoid unsustainable outcomes in some problematic cases at the cost of foreclosing socially useful class actions in others. In Amchem, for example, the Court rejected a massive coordinated effort to employ a settlement-only class action to address the catastrophe of asbestos personal injury litigation.²³⁵ The majority decision was characterized by strict formalism, demanding adherence to prophylactic rules without any allowance for a pragmatic assessment of the value of those rules in the actual case. That approach is appropriate when reviewing adequacy of representation—a structural protection that calls for prophylactic rules designed to guard against conflicts of interest. But it was counterproductive when applied to predominance—a requirement grounded in pragmatism where the need for prophylactic protection is not apparent and the case for a more context-sensitive exercise of discretion is compelling.²³⁶ Similarly, in the early years

²³⁴ See Robert G. Bone, Who Decides? A Critical Look at Procedural Discretion, 28 CARDOZO L. REV. 1961, 2002 (2007) (arguing that trial courts lack the competency to tailor procedures to individual cases in a consistently effective manner).

²³⁵ See Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 628-29 (1997) (recognizing that although “a nationwide administrative claims processing regime would provide the most secure, fair, and efficient means of compensating victims of asbestos exposure,” the case before the Court could not be sustained as a class action).

²³⁶ See Robert G. Bone, Walking the Class Action Maze: Toward a More Functional Rule 23, 46 U. MICH. J.L. REFORM 1097, 1106-07 (2013) (criticizing Amchem for “equating predominance with class cohesion and then tying class cohesion to the legitimacy of adjudicative representation” and thereby “enlist[ing] predominance to do due process and fairness work as well”); Robert H. Klonoff, The Decline of Class Actions, 90 WASH. U. L. REV. 729, 802-07 (2013) (discussing the impact of Amchem’s rigid approach to predominance on class settlement practices, which makes “courts feel constrained to reject a class settlement because of predominance issues that were irrelevant in the settlement context”).

The Court’s primary justification for a strict enforcement of predominance in the settlement context was a concern that class counsel would lack leverage in negotiations and that the court would have inadequate information in assessing the fairness of a proposed settlement:

[I]f a fairness inquiry under Rule 23(e) controlled certification, eclipsing Rule 23(a) and (b), and permitting class designation despite the impossibility of litigation, both class counsel and court would be disarmed. Class counsel confined to settlement negotiations could not use the threat of litigation to press for a better offer, and the court would face a bargain proffered for its approval without benefit of adversarial investigation.

Amchem, 521 U.S. at 621 (citations omitted).

I do not dismiss this concern out of hand, but it was clearly misapplied in the asbestos cases, where plaintiff’s counsel enjoyed significant leverage through the threat to continue litigating individual asbestos claims on an inventory basis, as indeed they did after the settlement was invalidated. See Deborah R. Hensler, As Time Goes By: Asbestos Litigation After Amchem and Ortiz, 80 TEX. L. REV. 1899, 1912-15 (2002) (describing the dynamics of aggregated inventory litigation of the TILA, when lower federal courts were presented with class actions that would have imposed crippling liability, sometimes based on minor and technical disclosure infractions,²³⁷ the discretion to assess the propriety of class certification in light of the purposes of the TILA alleviated the intense pressure to restrict Rule 23 in more categorical terms in order to avoid unsustainable results. The Wilcox court captures this proposition, as well: “It would be worse in the long run to maim or kill . . . Rule [23] with universal but improvident kindness than to limit on a case by case basis within sound judicial discretion its application to situations offering sensible results.”²³⁸

There are mediating factors in class action doctrine that address some of the concerns raised by the discretion to redefine a class or deny certification. One systemic counterweight to the impact of the discretion not to certify is the Supreme Court’s decision in *Smith v. Bayer Corp.*²³⁹ Bayer rejected an attempt by the defendant in a products liability case to use a federal court judgment that had denied certification of a proposed statewide class in West Virginia as grounds to enjoin a state court from certifying a class of the same claimants asserting the same claims.²⁴⁰ The Court found that differences in West Virginia’s certification standard meant that the issue resolved in the federal judgment was not the same as that presented in the state court, rendering the relitigation exception to the Anti-Injunction Act unavailable,²⁴¹ and also that the putative class members of the uncertified class were never made “parties” to the federal court action and hence were not bound by the judgment in any event.²⁴² The Court did not reach the question of whether due process would make injunctive enforcement of a denial of certification impossible, resting only on the federal common law of for asbestos claims). However, unlike the Court in Amchem, I view the impact that an inability to certify a litigation class would have upon class settlement negotiations as a matter properly subject to judicial discretion rather than a strict prophylactic rule.

²³⁷ The extent to which litigation under the early TILA involved only “technical” violations is disputed. See Christopher L. Peterson, Truth, Understanding, and High-Cost Consumer Credit: The Historical Context of the Truth in Lending Act, 55 F.L.A. L. REV. 807, 889-90 (2003) (noting that “more than half of TILA litigation in [the pre-1989 era] challenged the accuracy of finance charges ‘not a ‘technicality,’ but one of the two most fundamental disclosures mandated by TIL[A]’” (quoting KATHLEEN E. KEEST & GARY KLEIN, TRUTH IN LENDING 36 (3d ed. 1995))).

²³⁸ 474 F.2d 336, 349 (10th Cir. 1973); see also Marcus, supra note 103, at 1611 (highlighting problems with alternatives to the use of procedural discretion and noting that critics of discretion “seem to concede that the systemic changes that have led to the current situation do not admit of ready cures”).

²³⁹ 131 S. Ct. 2368 (2011).

²⁴⁰ Id. at 2382.

²⁴¹ Id. at 2377-79.

²⁴² Id. at 2379-82.

preclusion and reserving decision on the power of Congress or the drafters of the Federal Rules to expand the scope of that common law doctrine.²⁴³

Bayer erects a barrier that limits the impact of a federal court's denial of certification, preserving the ability of putative class members to initiate a new action and to convince another court that certification is in fact warranted. To the extent that the doctrine of discretion suggests room for different judgments among lower federal courts in the propriety of class certification, Bayer creates space for the exploration of the issue among different jurists. The "principles of comity" counseling adherence to prior rulings that the Supreme Court anticipated among lower federal courts in *Bayer*²⁴⁴ should operate at their strongest when the initial court determines that a proposed action fails to satisfy strict rule-based requirements for certification, rendering class treatment wholly inappropriate. Where the denial of certification involves the type of judgment that could lead "other district courts . . . [to] choose[] to certify similar classes," as the Tenth Circuit explained the issue in Shook,²⁴⁵ then the restraints of comity are weaker when the same issue is placed before a subsequent court.²⁴⁶

²⁴³ Id. at 2376 n.7, 2382 n.12. In previous work, I have argued that due process imposes no categorical barrier to the enforcement of a federal court's denial of class certification in subsequent cases, and that a prohibitory injunction against serial attempts to secure certification of the same class in a new court are constitutionally possible and sometimes warranted. See Tobias Barrington Wolff, Federal Jurisdiction and Due Process in the Era of the Nationwide Class Action, 156 U. PA. L. REV. 2035, 2109-17 (2008). I gave little attention in that treatment to the antecedent preclusion questions that the Court addressed in Bayer. The significance of that component of the analysis was made apparent when the Court provided a comprehensive restatement of the categories and limitations on nonparty preclusion under federal common law in Taylor v. Sturgell, 553 U.S. 880 (2008). See ALI, PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW OF AGGREGATE LITIGATION § 2.11 cmt. b (2010) (citing Wolff, supra, at 2109-17) (discussing the state of the law after the Court's decision in Taylor). The Court's holding in Bayer and its conservative treatment of the federal common law implications of the Class Action Fairness Act are both defensible. If Congress were to adopt a comprehensive approach to preclusion in federal class action litigation that included the possibility of preemptive force for denials of class certification, my earlier analysis would still lead me to conclude that due process would impose no categorical barrier.

Given the decision of the Court in Semtek International Inc. v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 531 U.S. 497, 503-04 (2001), which adopted a strained interpretation of Rule 41(b) in order to avoid the serious problems that would arise under the Rules Enabling Act if a Federal Rule purported to mandate a rule of preclusion, it is surprising that the Bayer Court flags "a change in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure" as one possible response to its holding. Bayer, 131 S. Ct. at 2382 n.12.

²⁴⁴ See 131 S. Ct. at 2382 ("[W]e would expect federal courts to apply principles of comity to each other's class certification decisions when addressing a common dispute.").

²⁴⁵ 543 F.3d 597, 603-04 (10th Cir. 2008).

²⁴⁶ The Third Circuit recognized a similar distinction in an early TILA case, entertaining an argument that decisions involving "nondiscretionary reasons for rejecting class action treatment" might be proper subjects for interlocutory review under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) whereas denials of certification that "involve[] the exercise of discretion" would not. Katz v. Carte Blanche Corp., 496

Another systemic counterweight is the ability of a district court to control the future preclusive effect of a class action judgment upon the ability of absentees to pursue related individual claims. District courts have the power to impose prospective constraints on the impact of their judgments in order to avoid debilitating conflicts of interest among class members arising from the risk of adverse preclusion consequences.²⁴⁷ A court presented with a class action that otherwise satisfies the requirements of Rule 23 can employ that power to facilitate certification where doing so is appropriate under the preclusion policies governing the dispute.²⁴⁸ The decision not to employ that power is, in effect, a discretionary judgment not to certify, whereas the decision to impose preclusion constraints to overcome any conflicts of interest is the affirmative use of discretion to certify a class. Similarly, a court's discretion to redefine a class may preserve the opportunity for class members to obtain the benefits of a representative proceeding despite the bad choices or skewed incentives of their representatives, as in Maneely v. City of Newburgh.²⁴⁹ The power of the court to protect class members from adverse preclusion effects helps to preserve the viability of that option.

B. Discretion in Class Certification After Shady Grove

It remains to ask whether this system of interlocking discretion in class certification, developed over half a century and affirmed or acknowledged by the Supreme Court on several occasions, was abruptly eliminated by the Court's opinion on the Rules Enabling Act in Shady Grove.²⁵⁰ In rejecting the argument that New York CPLR § 901(b) should operate in place of Federal Rule 23 when determining the availability of class relief on a statutory damages claim, the Court described Rule 23 in terms that appear disjunctive with the decades of practice described in the sections above. Rule 23 "creates a categorical rule entitling a plaintiff whose suit meets the F.2d 747, 752-53 (3d Cir. 1974) (en banc). The court ultimately found that the distinction was not controlling in a 1292(b) analysis. Id. at 756.

²⁴⁷ See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF JUDGMENTS § 26(1)(b) (1982) (recognizing an exception to the general prohibition against claim splitting when "[t]he court in the first action has expressly reserved the plaintiff's right to maintain the second action"); see also In re Vitamin C Antitrust Litig., 279 F.R.D. 90, 115-16 (E.D.N.Y. 2012) (expressly reserving the right of class members to pursue individual damages claims notwithstanding their membership in a class seeking injunctive relief).

²⁴⁸ I have explored these issues at some length in earlier work. See generally Tobias Barrington Wolff, Preclusion in Class Action Litigation, 105 COLUM. L. REV. 717 (2005).

²⁴⁹ See supra notes 141-146 and accompanying text.

²⁵⁰ 130 S. Ct. 1431 (2010).

specified criteria to pursue his claim as a class action,” the Court asserted—it “provides a one-size-fits-all formula for deciding the class-action question.”²⁵¹ Responding to Allstate’s argument that Rule 23 does not govern the certification question in every case, the majority opined:

[T]hat is exactly what Rule 23 does: It says that if the prescribed preconditions are satisfied “[a] class action may be maintained” (emphasis added)—not “a class action may be permitted.” Courts do not maintain actions; litigants do. The discretion suggested by Rule 23’s “may” is discretion residing in the plaintiff: He may bring his claim in a class action if he wishes. And like the rest of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 23 automatically applies “in all civil actions and proceedings in the United States district courts,” Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 1. See Califano v. Yamasaki, 442 U.S. 682, 699-700 (1979).²⁵²

Although the Court’s language here is broad and its emphatic tone typographically unmistakable, its holding addresses a limited question. The Court’s citation to Yamasaki in this passage highlights the narrow compass of its interpretation of Rule 23.

The argument that Allstate pursued before the Court, and to which this passage responds, asserted that Rule 23 was inapplicable to the certification question presented in that case—that class actions were wholly unavailable in a suit asserting statutory damages under New York law because Rule 23 did not govern the question, leaving CPLR § 901(b) to control.²⁵³ Reflecting the categorical nature of its position, Allstate attempted to rely upon a distinction between the criteria for certification and the “antecedent question . . . whether the particular type of claim is eligible for class treatment in the first place.”²⁵⁴ In this respect, Allstate was advancing an argument similar to the primary contention urged by the Social Security Administration in Yamasaki: that class certification in general, and a nationwide class in particular, was categorically unavailable in actions brought to enforce certain requirements under the Social Security Act.²⁵⁵ The Yamasaki Court rejected those categorical arguments in the portions of its opinion referenced ²⁵¹ Id. at 1437.

²⁵² Id. at 1438 (parallel citation omitted).

²⁵³ See Brief for Respondent at 10-12, Shady Grove Orthopedic Assocs. v. Allstate Ins. Co., 130 S. Ct. 1431 (2010) (No. 08-1008) (arguing that CPLR § 901(b) “categorically precludes class actions” and should apply in a federal diversity case).

²⁵⁴ Shady Grove, 130 S. Ct. at 1438.

²⁵⁵ See 442 U.S. at 698 (noting the Social Security Administration’s argument that class actions should be completely precluded under the relevant statute).

in the passage from Shady Grove quoted above.²⁵⁶ However, as discussed in Section II.C, the Yamasaki Court then proceeded to reaffirm the discretion of federal courts to determine whether a nationwide class is appropriate in a given case, taking into account the remedial needs of the plaintiffs, the burdens that a nationwide class might impose upon the defendant, and the broader systemic impact of a class action in light of other remedial proceedings already underway.²⁵⁷

The Court's assertion in Shady Grove that "[t]he discretion suggested by Rule 23's 'may' is discretion residing in the plaintiff" coupled with its references to the "automatic" and "one-size-fits-all" character of the rule are undeniably jarring.²⁵⁸ But those assertions respond to an argument about the categorical inapplicability of Rule 23. They do not address the proper application of the Rule in a given case. The Court's rejection of the categorical argument in Yamasaki did not render a nationwide class automatically available to any plaintiff who could show that the express requirements of the Rule were satisfied. And the Reiter Court's rejection of any categorical prohibition on consumer antitrust class actions was accompanied by a strong affirmation of the "broad power and discretion" vested in district courts "with respect to matters involving the certification and management of potentially cumbersome or frivolous class actions."²⁵⁹ Shady Grove's holding, too, addresses only a narrow categorical question.

This more limited reading of Shady Grove's treatment of Rule 23(b) seems compelled by the position adopted in dissent by then-Judge Scalia in Fink v. National Savings & Trust Co. As discussed above, Judge Scalia insisted "that the District Court has broad discretion in determining whether a suit should proceed as a class action," going so far as to adopt a rational-basis mode of analysis that would uphold a district court's discretionary denial of certification even in the absence of specified reasons so long as some proper basis for doing so could be discerned from the record.²⁶⁰ To read Shady Grove as foreclosing all discretion in the decision to ²⁵⁷ See id. at 702 ("[A] federal court when asked to certify a nationwide class should take care to ensure that the nationwide relief is indeed appropriate in the case before it, and that certification of such a class would not improperly interfere with the litigation of similar issues in other judicial districts.").

²⁵⁶ See id. at 700 (refusing to recognize that class relief under Rule 23 is unavailable without "clear expression of congressional intent to exempt [the] actions").

²⁵⁸ 130 S. Ct. at 1437-38.

²⁵⁹ Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., 442 U.S. 330, 345 (1979).

²⁶⁰ Fink v. Nat'l Sav. & Trust Co., 772 F.2d 951, 964-65 (D.C. Cir. 1985) (Scalia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

certify would ascribe a fatal inconsistency to Justice Scalia's treatment of the issue.

The limited scope of the Court's holding in Shady Grove is further illustrated by the position adopted by Justice Stevens in concurrence and the four dissenters led by Justice Ginsburg, who together formed a majority. All five embrace the proposition that Rule 23 (and any Federal Rule) must be applied with sensitivity to the impact the Rule might have upon the substantive policies of the applicable state law in a given case.²⁶¹ Their disagreement, and hence the result in the case, centered on the proper interpretation of CPLR § 901(b), which Justice Stevens did not believe to be a part of the liability policy of New York.²⁶²

As Professor Burbank and I have argued, there is much to criticize about this style of analysis, which invites non-uniform interpretations of the Federal Rules and threatens to elevate state substantive law over federal substantive law in the Rules Enabling Act hierarchy. The better interpretation would recognize the limited ability of Rule 23 to set substantive aggregate-liability policy in any case, requiring that courts applying the Rule always "look to the substantive liability and regulatory regimes of state and federal law in determining whether aggregate relief is appropriate and consistent with the goals of that underlying law."²⁶³ Many lower federal courts have done exactly that.

That difference aside, however, a clear majority of the Justices in Shady Grove did conclude that federal courts must make judgments about the propriety of class certification in light of the impact that certification would have upon the underlying substantive law. Thus, despite its broad language, the majority portion of Shady Grove's lead opinion must be understood as addressing only a Rules Enabling Act question: Rule 23's applicability in the face of contrary state procedural authority, which is what Justice Stevens understood CPLR § 901(b) to constitute.²⁶⁴

²⁶¹ See Shady Grove, 130 S. Ct. at 1451 n.5 (Stevens, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("I thus agree with Justice Ginsburg that a federal rule, like any federal law, must be interpreted in light of many different considerations, including 'sensitivity to important state interests' and 'regulatory policies.'") (citations omitted).

²⁶² See id. ("I disagree with Justice Ginsburg, however, about the degree to which the meaning of federal rules may be contorted, absent congressional authority to do so, to accommodate state policy goals."); id. at 1465 (Ginsburg, J., dissenting) (finding no need to apply Rule 23 because the New York state statute was directed to achieving a substantive result with regard to liability).

²⁶³ Burbank & Wolff, supra note 198, at 21.

²⁶⁴ See Shady Grove, 130 S. Ct. at 1456 (Stevens, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (concluding that CPLR § 901(b) is procedural and not "sufficiently interwoven with the scope of a substantive right or remedy" to present a Rules Enabling Act problem).

Many lower federal courts discussing the propriety and bounds of class certification in light of discretionary factors, particularly those touching on matters of liability or regulatory policy, have located their analysis in the superiority requirement when an action for damages is proposed under subsection (b)(3), or in the general standards of equitable relief and the proposition that injunctive relief should be “appropriate” when a plaintiff files under subsection (b)(2). No part of the Court’s opinion in Shady Grove addresses those features of Rule 23. Although it is true that the Court built up a head of rhetorical steam in rejecting Allstate’s categorical argument under the Rules Enabling Act, it would be a mistake to read the opinion as speaking in any way to the administration of these provisions of the Rule.

Other courts exercising discretion in class certification, in contrast, have treated this power as inherent in the Rule 23 inquiry—as indeed the Court itself did in Yamasaki and Reiter—rather than tying discretion to particular provisions of the Rule. In some instances, courts have pointed to the “may be maintained” language of Rule 23(b) as evidence of that inherent discretion.²⁶⁵ This was an unremarkable proposition before Shady Grove introduced confusion about the significance of that language. For the time being, at least, there is room for debate about the status of extra-textual discretion under Rule 23, and federal courts would be well-advised to provide specific textual grounding when a proposed class action requires the exercise of judgment.²⁶⁶ For example, a ruling on the scope of class certification in an immature tort case, as in Rhone-Poulenc, might require a court to provide more specific justification under the superiority requirement of section (b)(3), as the Fifth Circuit did in Castano.²⁶⁷

In the years since the Court decided Shady Grove, the lower federal courts have treated the case almost exclusively as a Rules Enabling Act decision and have given it little attention in the class certification analysis. That response is appropriate. It would be preferable for the Court to clarify the limited scope of its ruling, and better still for it to issue a mea culpa for its loose treatment of the language of Rule 23(b). In the interim, however, there is no cause for lower federal courts to make significant changes to their certification practice under Rule 23 outside of the specific Rules Enabling Act issue that Shady Grove addressed.

²⁶⁵ See, e.g., Harriss v. Pan Am. World Airways, Inc., 74 F.R.D. 24, 47 (N.D. Cal. 1977) (“[T]he Court regards any order at this stage as nothing more than a tentative determination for procedural purposes that the action may be maintained as a class action on behalf of a defined class.”).

²⁶⁶ See, e.g., In re TWL Corp., 712 F.3d 886, 894-95 (5th Cir. 2013) (quoting language from Shady Grove describing Rule 23 as creating “a categorical rule entitling a plaintiff . . . to pursue his claim as a class action” but also reaffirming that a district court has discretion in determining whether the superiority requirement is satisfied).

²⁶⁷ See Castano v. Am. Tobacco Co., 84 F.3d 734, 740-41 (5th Cir. 1996) (“[A]t this time, while the tort [of inducing nicotine-dependence] is immature, the class complaint must be dismissed, as class certification cannot be found to be a superior method of adjudication.”); id. at 746-51 (undertaking an extended superiority analysis).

CONCLUSION

In his book How Judges Think, Judge Posner makes a trenchant case for pragmatism in the administration of complex legal questions. “The core of legal pragmatism,” he writes, “is pragmatic adjudication, and its core is heightened judicial concern for consequences and thus a disposition to base policy judgments on them rather than on conceptualisms and generalities.”²⁶⁸ In response to the objection that pragmatic analysis leads to “ad hoc adjudication, in the sense of having regard only for the consequences to the parties to the immediate case,” Judge Posner insists that “sensible legal pragmatism tells the judge to consider systemic, including institutional, consequences as well as consequences of the decision in the case at hand.”²⁶⁹

The drafters of modern Rule 23 understood that they were placing a tool in the hands of the judiciary that would give rise to significant changes in civil litigation, the legal profession, and the content of the underlying law itself. As Professor Kaplan wrote, “[n]ew [R]ule 23 alters the pattern of class actions; subdivision (b)(3), in particular, is a new category deliberately created.”²⁷⁰ The effects of such a paradigm shift were unpredictable at the inception, and the ongoing adjustments necessary to maintain a workable system of class adjudication have never lent themselves easily to specification within the text of the Rule. Rather, lower federal courts have pursued a course of sensible legal pragmatism of the type that Judge Posner endorsed—including, in appropriate cases, “sustaining the authority of the trial court to employ realism and good sense in denying class action status”²⁷¹ where doing so is most faithful to the underlying substantive law.

The point of recognizing discretion in class certification is not to restrict the class action as a tool for the private enforcement of public norms. To the contrary, the point is to preserve it. If the class action is to retain its vitality, then the federal judiciary must remember its own history. Lower federal courts have employed a range of tools to authorize class treatment as a means of carrying into effect important statutory and constitutional policies ²⁶⁸ RICHARD A. POSNER, HOW JUDGES THINK 238 (2008).

²⁶⁹ Id.

²⁷⁰ Benjamin Kaplan, Continuing Work of the Civil Committee: 1966 Amendments of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (I), 81 HARV. L. REV. 356, 399 (1967).

²⁷¹ Wilcox v. Commerce Bank of Kan. City, 474 F.2d 336, 347 (10th Cir. 1973).

while employing their discretion to prevent class certification from producing counterproductive and unsustainable results. The Supreme Court exhibited an unfortunate tone deafness to that doctrinal symphony when choosing some of the language with which it responded to the Rules Enabling Act question placed before it in Shady Grove. There is reason to believe, however, that any appearance of an anomaly will be short-lived.

7AA Fed. Prac. & Proc. Civ. § 1785.2 (3d ed.)

Federal Practice and Procedure (Wright & Miller) | April 2023 Update

Federal Rules of Civil Procedure

Chapter 5. Parties

Mary Kay Kane

Rule 23. Class Actions

Robert Klonoff presently updates the coverage of Civil Rule 23.

Mary Kay Kane prepared the Third Edition's coverage of Civil Rule 23.

D. Whether Class Action Should Be Certified; Notice; Judgment; And Partial Class Actions

§ 1785.2 Additional Certification Issues—The Need for Class Relief

Primary Authority

- Fed. R. Civ. P. 23

Forms

- West's Federal Forms §§ 3051 to 3107

As was discussed earlier,¹ in exercising its discretion to certify a class action, the court may take account of considerations not expressly dealt with in Rule 23. One common non-rule factor that courts have considered in actions brought under Rule 23\(b\)\(2\) for injunctive or declaratory relief is whether there is a need for class relief.² The Seventh Circuit has explicitly rejected the use of this additional prerequisite, holding that if the requirements of Rule 23 are met, the court may not deny class status because there is no “need” for it,³ and a few other lower courts similarly have refused to impose a need requirement.⁴ However, the vast majority of courts have not felt so constrained, and the need requirement now seems well-accepted as an appropriate consideration when certifying a Rule 23\(b\)\(2\) action.

A review of the cases invoking this requirement reveals that there have been some important changes in its application as courts have become more sensitive to some of the effects of refusing class certification. In most cases utilizing the requirement, the courts simply refuse class certification stating that a class action is not necessary inasmuch as all the class members will benefit from any injunction issued on behalf of a single plaintiff.⁵ Certification is denied so as to avoid the extra costs and complexities necessarily associated with class suits. However, what is lacking in these decisions is any analysis of whether in the particular case at hand it is appropriate to conclude that the same result could be achieved by individual litigation that would occur using Rule 23, or whether, even if the ultimate judgment in an individual action would benefit all affected by defendant's conduct, there are other reasons that support the need for class relief. Rather, in these cases, the presumption that there is no need is invoked and class certification is denied without any further inquiry.

Other courts, while requiring the movant to demonstrate that there is a need for class certification, have proceeded more cautiously and have examined closely the facts of the case at hand to determine whether class certification might be necessary. In many instances, this inquiry still results in the denial of class relief.⁶ The mere allegation that it would be desirable or necessary for certification under Rule 23(b)(2) is not enough without some showing of why that is so. In several other cases, courts have found that there is a need for certification of a Rule 23(b)(2) action.⁷ A brief look at some of the reasons that have justified class treatment illustrates the kinds of special protections that Rule 23 provides.

Some courts have recognized that in cases in which the mootness of the plaintiff's claim before the action is terminated is highly likely,⁸ class status may be vital to the continuation of the suit and thus certification is proper.⁹ Additionally, when plaintiff is seeking retroactive monetary relief in addition to an injunction, then a judgment merely on behalf of the named plaintiffs will not benefit all the class members, and certification has been allowed.¹⁰ Permitting an action to proceed on a class basis also may result in larger attorney-fee awards¹¹ and this may act as a greater incentive to attorneys to undertake what otherwise may be unpopular litigation. Insofar as the underlying grievance is one that it is important to encourage private litigants to pursue in order to deter defendants from engaging in some conduct, then class certification seems to foster this objective more effectively than individual litigation would.

In evaluating the propriety of the conclusion that class relief often is not necessary in injunction cases, it also is useful to consider several cases in which the courts originally refused certification on the ground that if an individual judgment was obtained declaring a particular policy of the defendant to be illegal or unconstitutional, defendant most likely would alter its policies in compliance with the judgment, to the benefit of all. In some of these cases the assumption that defendants would readily comply with respect to all affected persons proved unfounded. This resulted in renewed litigation, with class certification then being allowed because the need to bind defendant to a judgment on behalf of the entire class was apparent.¹² This problem became particularly acute, for example, in New York in cases raising challenges to the application of various provisions of the welfare laws and seeking to enjoin the public officials enforcing those laws from certain practices. Consequently, in several cases the federal district courts there noted the lack of good faith on the part of defendants and ruled that certification of a Rule 23(b)(2) class suit was proper, unless defendant explicitly agreed in advance to abide by whatever decision was reached in applying the challenged regulation or practice to other similarly situated individuals. Only if defendant's compliance is explicitly assured will the court refuse certification;¹³ if it is not, certification is proper.¹⁴ Indeed, some courts have gone even further and have suggested that class certification is preferred because it will make the scope of any judgment explicit and unmistakable, to the benefit of both plaintiffs and defendants.¹⁵

Westlaw. © 2023 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

Footnotes

¹ Discussed earlier

See § 1785 at nn. 19 to 20.

² Need requirement

Note, The “Need Requirement”: A Barrier to Class Actions Under Rule 23(b)(2), 1979, 67 Geo.L.J. 1211.

Note, There Is Always a Need: The “Necessity Doctrine” and Class Certification Against Government Agencies, 2005, 103 Mich.L.Rev. 1018.

3

Seventh Circuit rejects

🚩 Brown v. Scott, C.A.7th, 1979, 602 F.2d 791, affirmed on other grounds sub nom. Carey v. Brown, 1980, 100 S.Ct. 2286, 447 U.S. 455, 65 L.Ed.2d 263.

Vergara v. Hampton, C.A.7th, 1978, 581 F.2d 1281.

Alliance to 🚩 End Repression v. Rochford, C.A.7th, 1977, 565 F.2d 975.

🚩 Vickers v. Trainor, C.A.7th, 1976, 546 F.2d 739.

🚩 Fujishima v. Board of Educ., C.A.7th, 1972, 460 F.2d 1355.

🚩 Edmond v. Goldsmith, D.C.Ind.1998, 38 F.Supp.2d 1016, 1020 n. 4, citing Wright, Miller & Kane, reversed on other grounds C.A.7th, 1999, 183 F.3d 659.

Paul v. Indiana Election Bd., D.C.Ind.1990, 743 F.Supp. 616.

🚩 Ragsdale v. Turnock, D.C.Ill.1985, 625 F.Supp. 1212, vacated in part, affirmed in part on other grounds C.A.7th, 1988, F.2d 1358.

Borowski v. City of Burbank, D.C.Ill.1984, 101 F.R.D. 59.

🚩 Garcia v. Rush Presbyterian-St. Luke's Medical Center, D.C.Ill.1978, 80 F.R.D. 254.

Dixon v. Quern, D.C.Ill.1977, 76 F.R.D. 617.

🚩 Sturdevant v. Deer, D.C.Wis.1976, 73 F.R.D. 375.

The manageability factors of the class-action rule are applicable only to class actions brought under Rule 23(b)(3); in an action brought under Rule 23(b)(2), only the prerequisites of the first paragraph and the requirements of the second subsection of the second paragraph need be satisfied. Metropolitan Area Housing Alliance v. U.S. Department of HUD, D.C.Ill.1976, 69 F.R.D. 633.

4

Need requirement rejected

🚩 Littlewolf v. Hodel, D.C.D.C.1988, 681 F.Supp. 929, affirmed 🚩 C.A.D.C.1989, 877 F.2d 1058.

🚩⚠️ Reproductive Health Servs. v. Webster, D.C.Mo.1987, 662 F.Supp. 407.

In an action by homeowners with mortgages guaranteed or insured by the Veterans Administration seeking an injunction requiring the Administration to implement a mortgage assignment program, plaintiffs' motion for class certification was granted, when it was undisputed that plaintiffs had satisfied the numerosity requirement, plaintiffs, by attacking the absence of a program, rather than abuse in its administration, had raised common questions of law or fact, plaintiffs' claims were typical of those of the proposed class, plaintiffs adequately represented the proposed class and a "need" requirement for class action would not be imposed. Gatter v. Cleland, D.C.Pa.1980, 87 F.R.D. 66.

🚩 Gramby v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., D.C.Pa.1979, 84 F.R.D. 655.

🚩 Johnson v. Mississippi, D.C.Miss.1977, 78 F.R.D. 37, remanded on other grounds C.A.5th, 1978, 586 F.2d 387.

🚩 Kornbluh v. Stearns & Foster Co., D.C.Ohio 1976, 73 F.R.D. 307, 310, citing Wright & Miller.

Percy v. Brennan, D.C.N.Y.1974, 384 F.Supp. 800, citing Wright & Miller.

See also

The district court could not deny class certification based solely on its determination that certification was "unnecessary," and thus remand was required to allow the court to consider the requisite factors for class certification as "necessity" was not an express requirement of Rule 23 and the criteria the district court was required to consider were wholly absent from its discussion. Gayle v. Warden Monmouth County Correctional Institution, 838 F.3d 297 (3d Cir. 2016).

Nehmer v. U.S. Veterans' Administration, D.C.Cal.1987, 118 F.R.D. 113.

5

Certification refused

Kansas Health Care Ass'n v. Kansas Dep't of Social & Rehabilitation Servs., C.A.10th, 1994, 31 F.3d 1536, 1548, citing Wright, Miller & Kane.

When the relief sought in an action challenging the constitutionality of the Arizona statutes providing that voting in elections for directors of the agricultural and improvement and power district was limited to the landowners, with votes essentially apportioned to owned acreage, as a practical matter, would produce the same end result as formal class-wide relief, it was not an abuse of discretion to deny certification of the suit as a class action. James v. Ball, C.A.9th, 1979, 613 F.2d 180, reversed on other grounds 1981, 101 S.Ct. 1, 451 U.S. 355, 68 L.Ed.2d 150.

When the prospective effect of a judgment that the state participating in the federal emergency-assistance program could not automatically exclude persons from eligibility for the program because they needed emergency assistance to pay utility bills would inure adequately to the benefit of all the proposed class members and when retroactive monetary relief was not at issue, class certification was not appropriate.

Davis v. Smith, C.A.2d, 1978, 607 F.2d 535.

Craft v. Memphis Light, Gas & Water Div., C.A.6th, 1976, 534 F.2d 684, affirmed on the merits 1978, 98 S.Ct. 1554, 436 U.S. 1, 56 L.Ed.2d 30.

Another consideration in analyzing whether to certify a class under Rule 23(b)(2) is whether class certification is necessary. Fish v. Kobach, 318 F.R.D. 450 (D. Kan. 2016).

Property owners were not entitled to certification of a proposed class of insured property owners to obtain declaratory relief in order to provide them with notice of the district court's ruling, that the homeowners insurance policy exclusion for backed up water did not bar coverage for water damage to a basement caused by water originating from within the insured premises that reentered through a basement drain due to blockage or an other plumbing failure; a ruling would inure to the benefit of all similarly-situated insureds without certification, the putative class members would not be entitled to notice even if the court certified the class, declaratory relief would not necessarily resolve coverage issues for other insureds, the insureds' individual incentive to file individual actions was not lacking, and no other useful purpose would be served by granting class relief. Monteleone v. The Auto Club Group, 113 F. Supp. 3d 950 (E.D. Mich. 2015).

Public demonstrators failed to show that class certification was necessary to obtain any of the requested relief in their action against law enforcement officials seeking a declaration that Iowa's flag-abuse statutes were unconstitutional, thus precluding class certification; if the statutes at issue were held to be unconstitutional, that decision would be binding on all of Iowa's governmental subdivisions and law-enforcement agencies and would inure to the benefit of all members of the proposed class, thus obviating the need for the lawsuit to proceed as a class action. Phelps v. Powers, 295 F.R.D. 349, 354 (S.D. Iowa 2013), citing Wright, Miller & Kane.

In an action by public school students who had been long-term suspended and who allegedly were not given proper notice or a hearing by the defendant board before those suspensions were imposed in violation of procedural due process, a class action was not maintainable on the ground that final injunctive or corresponding declaratory relief was appropriate respecting the class as a whole because an injunction for the individual plaintiffs would amount to exactly the same relief as an injunction for the entire class as the decree would run to the benefit of other persons similarly situated. M.R. v. Board of School Com's of Mobile County, 286 F.R.D. 510 (S.D. Ala. 2012).

Citizens' facial challenge to the constitutionality of the District of Columbia's neighborhood safety zone (NSZ) program, which sought an injunction prohibiting further implementation of the program and expungement of any information obtained by virtue of the program, afforded complete protection to all persons potentially affected by the NSZ program, and thus certification of two proposed classes was unnecessary, when the citizens' challenge did not turn on any fact particular to the proposed classes, the citizens did not seek retroactive monetary relief, and one of the citizens' proposed classes was underinclusive.  Mills v. District of Columbia, 266 F.R.D. 20 (D.D.C. 2010).

Class certification was not warranted for an administrator's claim for a declaratory judgment that the Texas Unclaimed Property Law, providing for property held in trust to be deposited into the general fund, unconstitutionally permitted the state and the Comptroller to retain property and revenue generated therefrom, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's proscription against taking without just compensation, since all the proposed class members who were not part of the action but were aggrieved by the statute in the same manner as the administrator would have the benefit of the court's ruling concerning the statute's constitutionality as asserted individually by the administrator, without the necessity of asserting the claim as a class.  Arnett v. Strayhorn, 515 F. Supp. 2d 690 (W.D. Tex. 2006), aff'd per curiam, 508 F.3d 1134 (5th Cir. 2007), cert. denied, 128 S. Ct. 2062, 170 L. Ed. 2d 794 (2008).

Class certification in an ADA disability-discrimination action seeking access to theme parks and related facilities was unnecessary, when plaintiffs were only seeking injunctive relief which, if granted, would necessarily benefit all other potential class members; the complexity and expense of a class action was not necessary as plaintiffs could achieve by injunction all the relief which would inure to similarly situated persons without the necessity of class certification.  Access Now Inc. v. Walt Disney World Co., D.C.Fla.2001, 211 F.R.D. 452.

In an action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief to require the reopening of a health-care facility providing services for developmentally disabled children, the motion for certification of a plaintiff class of children with developmental disabilities or risk of becoming developmentally disabled would be denied as superfluous since defendant was a governmental agency and, if plaintiffs were granted relief, it would affect all former and future patients of the facility irrespective of whether they were included in the class action. Lincoln CERCPAC v. Health & Hosp. Corp., D.C.N.Y.1996, 920 F.Supp. 488.

Ad Hoc Comm. to Save Homer G. Phillips Hosp. v. City of St. Louis, D.C.Mo.1992, 143 F.R.D. 216.

Food-stamp recipients whose awards were improperly reduced by the administrator's treatment of the utility reimbursement that the recipients received as tenants in federally assisted public-housing projects as income were not entitled to class certification because a prospective injunction which prohibited treatment of the utilities reimbursement as income benefitted the proposed class and, thus, no useful purpose would be served by certifying the matter as a class action. Baum v. Yeutter, D.C.Ohio 1991, 758 F.Supp. 423.

In a case challenging the Department of Labor's regulations interpreting a section of the Trade Act governing worker eligibility for trade-adjustment assistance, class certification was not appropriate with regard to members of a subclass consisting of those who had been denied benefits because of the challenged interpretation, considering that the same relief could be obtained without a class action; if the court decided that interpretation of the statute was contrary to congressional intent, members of the proposed class who had been denied benefits because of the interpretation would be entitled to seek redress from the appropriate state administrative agency. Cunningham v. U.S. Department of Labor, D.C.Me.1987, 670 F.Supp. 1062.

Women's Health Center of West County, Inc. v. Webster, D.C.Mo.1987, 670 F.Supp. 845, affirmed C.A.8th, 1989, F.2d 1377.

Class action was neither useful nor required with regard to allegations by government employees' union that Federal Labor Relations Authority and several individually named defendants had violated a statutory and constitutional mandate to decide exceptions to arbitration awards; only declaratory and injunctive relief was sought on behalf of the class, and an order providing relief to the government employees' union and all similarly situated persons could be fashioned without resort to a class action. Local 1928, American Fed. of Gov't Employees v. Federal Labor Relations Authority, D.C.D.C.1986, 630 F.Supp. 947.

Simpson v. Heckler, D.C.Pa.1986, 630 F.Supp. 736.

In an action for declaratory and injunctive relief from allegedly overcrowded and unhealthful prison conditions, class certification was unnecessary and inappropriate because all members of the proposed class would have benefited from any relief granted by the court, even if the class were not certified. Lent v. Lopes, D.C.Conn.1985, 107 F.R.D. 62.

红旗 LaMadrid v. Hegstrom, D.C.Or.1984, 599 F.Supp. 1450, reversed on the merits C.A.9th, 1987, 830 F.2d 1524. 黄旗

Certification of a class in an action complaining of malapportionment in county board of supervisors districts was unnecessary and inappropriate when there was a substantial overlap between the two proposed classes, there was more than a chance that neither of the competing representatives could fully and fairly represent all members of the proposed classes, and the relief that was sought would have the same effect as a class action whether or not the class was certified. 红旗 Cook v. Luckett, D.C.Miss.1983, 575 F.Supp. 485, vacated on other grounds C.A.5th, 1984, 735 F.2d 912.

An action challenging the Ohio policy of "deeming" Old Age, Survivor and Disability Insurance Program payments to a representative payee as income to minor mothers who applied for Aid to Families with Dependent Children was not certified as a class action in that to the extent the requested declaratory and injunctive relief was granted it automatically would accrue to the benefit of others similarly situated. Snider v. Creasy, D.C.Ohio 1982, 548 F.Supp. 601.

红旗 Curry v. Dempsey, D.C.Mich.1981, 520 F.Supp. 70, reversed on the merits C.A.6th, 1983, 701 F.2d 580.

When plaintiffs were seeking a declaratory judgment and a permanent injunction and when, if the court entered a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, it would be sufficiently broad to protect the interests of potential members of the proposed class, no purpose would be served by certifying the class. 黄旗 Ruhe v. Block, D.C.Va.1981, 507 F.Supp. 1290, affirmed on other grounds C.A.4th, 1982, 683 F.2d 102.

Class certification is not necessary to injunctive relief having broad effect. 红旗 Collins v. Marshall, D.C.Mo.1981, 507 F.Supp. 83.

Tenants seeking reimbursement for illegally charged maintenance fees would not be certified as a class represented by a tenant who was refunded his damage assessment as a result of pursuing a grievance procedure provided by the landlord subsequent to the commencement of the initial suit, because the relief sought with respect to modification of the leases already had been achieved, so that a major portion of the claimed relief was for damages, because of the factual differences in claims and differences and questions of law, because not all members of the putative class had exhausted the administrative remedies within the landlord's grievance procedure, and because any declaratory or injunctive relief would accrue to the benefit of all other tenants whether the action proceeded as a class or not. Tolle v. Knoxville's Community Devel. Corp., D.C.Tenn.1981, 93 F.R.D. 376.

Class certification was neither necessary nor appropriate in a tenant's action, in which it was alleged that she and others similarly situated were overcharged for rent by the city housing authority and in which damages and declaratory and injunctive relief were sought, in view of the fact that there was no reason to doubt that the public agency and the public officials involved would give to all the members of the proposed class the benefits of any judgment accorded the tenant and that, although the tenant had shown that the proposed class might contain over 700 persons, none of the parties had personal knowledge of any case similar to the tenant's. Kow v. New York City Housing Authority, D.C.N.Y.1981, 92 F.R.D. 73.

Nelson v. Mustian, D.C.Fla.1980, 502 F.Supp. 698.

When it appeared that no purpose would be served by allowing more than one plaintiff to pursue the legal action on the nonfrivolous conditions of prison-confinement claims, and there was every reason to believe that one plaintiff could move forward adequately on jointly alleged claims, the claims asserted by other plaintiffs would be dismissed. Griffin v. Smith, D.C.N.Y.1980, 493 F.Supp. 129.

Although the action to test the constitutionality of a nocturnal juvenile-curfew ordinance satisfied the prerequisites of Rule 23, the district court exercised its discretion in denying class status after determining that a class action was unnecessary to ensure an appropriate examination of the constitutionality of the ordinance.  Johnson v. City of Opelousas, D.C.La.1980, 488 F.Supp. 433.

International Soc. of Krishna Consciousness v. State Fair of Texas, D.C.Tex.1979, 480 F.Supp. 67.

Jones v. MacMillan Bloedel Containers, Inc., D.C.Ark.1979, 84 F.R.D. 640.

The satisfaction of the prerequisites of Rule 23 does not end the court's inquiry relating to class certification, but, rather, under an analysis that has become known as one of a "standard of necessity," plaintiffs must demonstrate that it is necessary to certify the class in order to assure the effectiveness of any eventual remedial decree. Cruz v. Collazo, D.C.Puerto Rico 1979, 84 F.R.D. 307.

 Coalition for Block Grant Compliance v. Department of HUD, D.C.Mich.1978, 450 F.Supp. 43.

When plaintiff neither moved to certify the class nor objected to proceeding on the merits and when the effect of the court's decree would extend to plaintiff and all others similarly situated irrespective of whether the case proceeded as a class action, certification of the case as a class action would be denied. Ball v. Brown, D.C.Ohio 1977, 450 F.Supp. 4.

 Drumright v. Padzieski, D.C.Mich.1977, 436 F.Supp. 310.

Emma G. v. Edwards, D.C.La.1977, 434 F.Supp. 1048.

Class certification of an action brought by nursing-home residents contesting procedures of the state and city departments of social services would be deemed superfluous, inasmuch as defendants were public officials charged with compliance with the enforcement of federal as well as state laws and the court would assume that, mindful of their responsibilities, they would apply the court's determinations made equally to all persons similarly situated. Feld v. Berger, D.C.N.Y.1976, 424 F.Supp. 1356.

Murray v. Norberg, D.C.R.I.1976, 423 F.Supp. 795.

Marimont v. Mathews, D.C.D.C.1976, 422 F.Supp. 32.

Bradley v. Kissinger, D.C.D.C.1976, 418 F.Supp. 64.

Since the burdens of maintaining the class action were substantial because of the discovery problems that would arise and since injunctive relief would run to the class even without class certification, the class would not be certified on the theory that the party opposing the class had acted or refused to act on grounds generally applicable to the class.  Berlin Democratic Club v. Rumsfeld, D.C.D.C.1976, 410 F.Supp. 144.

 City of Hartford v. Hills, D.C.Conn.1976, 408 F.Supp. 889, reversed on other grounds sub nom.

 City of Hartford v. Town of Glastonbury, C.A.2d, 1976, 561 F.2d 1032, 1048, certiorari denied 98 S.Ct. 766, 434 U.S. 1034, 54 L.Ed.2d 781.

Brown v. Beal, D.C.Pa.1975, 404 F.Supp. 770 (action challenging state statutory scheme for “categorically needy” benefits under medicaid).

 Church of God of Louisiana, Inc. v. Monroe-Ouachita Regional Planning Comm'n, D.C.La.1975, 404 F.Supp. 175.

Coffin v. Secretary of HEW, D.C.D.C.1975, 400 F.Supp. 953, appeal dismissed 1977, 97 S.Ct. 1539, 430 U.S. 924, 51 L.Ed.2d 789.

When plaintiffs requested only declaratory and injunctive relief, which would in any event benefit all the members of the proposed plaintiff class, plaintiffs' motion for class-action certification was denied.

 Jones v. New York City Human Resources Administration, D.C.N.Y.1975, 391 F.Supp. 1064, affirmed on other grounds C.A.2d, 1976, 528 F.2d 696, certiorari denied 97 S.Ct. 80, 429 U.S. 825, 50 L.Ed.2d 88.

 Barrett v. U.S. Civil Serv. Comm'n, D.C.D.C.1975, 69 F.R.D. 544, 554, citing Wright & Miller.

When, if plaintiffs succeeded, the relief granted would inure to the benefit of plaintiffs and all similarly situated, and the relief requested, if granted, would be identical regardless of whether a class action was maintained, no useful purpose for proceeding as a class appeared, and the motion for class-action status was denied.  Nelson v. Likins, D.C.Minn.1974, 389 F.Supp. 1234, affirmed per curiam C.A.8th, 1975, 510 F.2d 414.

Abbit v. Bernier, D.C.Conn.1974, 387 F.Supp. 57 (action for declaratory relief).

When injunctive relief to require the Secretary of Agriculture to submit to the court a plan for the expenditure of a budget surplus in the food-stamp program in a manner consistent with the Food Stamp Act would, if granted, be identical regardless of whether a class action was maintained on behalf of all actual or potential food-stamp recipients in the United States, no useful purpose for proceeding as a class appeared and the suit could not be maintained as a class action. Bennett v. Butz, D.C.Minn.1974, 386 F.Supp. 1059, 1062 n. 1.

Class-action status was unnecessary as regards a suit seeking an evidentiary hearing prior to the recoupment of alleged excess retirement payments made under the Social Security Act since any relief that might be ordered on behalf of the named plaintiffs as individuals with respect to hearing rights mandated by due process and the adequacy of the present procedures necessarily would inure to the benefit of the class as a whole.  Thomas v. Weinberger, D.C.N.Y.1974, 384 F.Supp. 540.

In a suit that plaintiffs sought to maintain as a class action, a class of black citizens who might in the future seek employment, even as to generations yet unborn, was inappropriate for failure to meet the requirement of an actual case or controversy and for the further reason that, if relief was accorded to plaintiffs, the evils would be corrected and that correction would inure to the benefit of the entire black community.  Hines v. D'Artois, D.C.La.1974, 383 F.Supp. 184.

An action challenging the constitutionality of a Kentucky statute governing the sale of a boat or motor vehicle to satisfy the charge for repairs made or accessories furnished would not be certified as a class action since, in reality, the suit was a class action for persons who were affected by the statute.  Cockerel v. Caldwell, D.C.Ky.1974, 378 F.Supp. 491.

Regardless of whether plaintiffs, a professional society of podiatrists licensed to practice in the District of Columbia as well as 11 members of the society, met the requirements of Rule 23, the court would deny the motion to certify a class action charging discrimination against the podiatrists in favor of physicians in administering the medicaid program in the District of Columbia in violation of the Social Security Act and the due-process clause of the Fifth Amendment, since the declaratory and injunctive relief being sought could be shaped to have the same purpose and effect as a class action.  District of Columbia Podiatry Soc. v. District of Columbia, D.C.D.C.1974, 65 F.R.D. 113.

 Vietnam Veterans Against the War v. Benecke, D.C.Mo.1974, 63 F.R.D. 675.

 Stroemer v. Shevin, D.C.Fla.1973, 399 F.Supp. 993.

“(I)t is immaterial whether plaintiffs satisfy the requirements set out in Fed.R.Civ.P. 23. As the use of the word ‘may’ in Rule 23\(b\) suggests, a court is not bound to let a case continue as a class action because the requirements of Rule 23 are met; under the circumstances of these cases, where retroactive relief is inappropriate, no purpose is served by allowing the plaintiffs to sue as representatives of a class.” Schneider v. Margossian, D.C.Mass.1972, 349 F.Supp. 741, 746 (per Garrity, J.).

6

No need found

“(W)e see no practical need for class certification. Plaintiff’s claim was not moot, and plaintiff was represented by an attorney from Rhode Island Legal Services, Inc., an office that can be expected to maintain an ongoing interest in seeing that the decree is enforced. The court could reasonably assume the good faith of a defendant such as the Chief Clerk of a state court especially given his express willingness to follow the court’s injunction.”  Dionne v. Bouley, C.A.1st, 1985, 757 F.2d 1344, 1357.

 Sandford v. R.L. Coleman Realty Co., C.A.4th, 1978, 573 F.2d 173.

Trial court would not certify a class in a suit brought by a mother challenging the state Department of Social Services interpretation of the Medicaid Act to require mothers otherwise ineligible for Medicaid to receive limited prenatal, delivery and post-partum care to cooperate in obtaining reimbursement from the father, even though the technical requirements for certification were met; it could be assumed that the Department would abide by the court decision and not apply the cooperation requirement to mothers similarly situated, without the necessity of proceeding with the class action.  Perry v. Dowling, D.C.N.Y.1995, 888 F.Supp. 485, reversed on the merits  C.A.2d, 1996, 95 F.3d 231.

Kansas Health Care Ass'n v. Kansas Dep't of Social & Rehabilitation Servs., D.C.Kan.1993, 822 F.Supp. 687, 689, citing Wright, Miller & Kane, affirmed  C.A.10th, 1994, 31 F.3d 1536.

Action brought by persons or entities associated with the Socialist Worker’s Party seeking declaratory and injunctive relief against the enforcement of recordkeeping, reporting, and disclosure provisions of the Florida election laws on the basis that forced disclosure would have a chilling effect on the exercise of their constitutional rights was not certified as a class action; there was no benefit to a class action because a court injunction would prevent any disclosure benefiting both plaintiffs and the putative class, particularly when notification of the class members might undermine the thrust of the lawsuit. McArthur v. Firestone, D.C.Fla.1988, 690 F.Supp. 1018, 1019, citing Wright, Miller & Kane.

Automatic accrual of a benefit to others similarly situated, if the representative payee and child beneficiary obtained the relief requested in a challenge to the rule that treated social-security, old age, survivors, and disability benefits as income available to the family when determining eligibility for aid to families with dependent children, justified denial of the class action due to the fact that no useful purpose would be served by permitting the case to proceed as a class action.  Elam v. Barry, D.C.Ohio 1986, 656 F.Supp. 140, reversed on other grounds sub nom. Collins v. Barry, C.A.6th, 1988, 826 F.2d 1297, certiorari denied 109 S.Ct. 75, 488 U.S. 826, 102 L.Ed.2d 52.

No class would be certified in an action challenging the constitutionality of a statute denying social-security retirement benefits to imprisoned felons; there were numerous similar cases progressing through the courts, and a sufficient number of authoritative decisions would sooner produce a conclusive result than would management of a nationwide class action, with less expense to the parties and to the courts. Graham v. Bowen, D.C.Tex.1986, 648 F.Supp. 298.

In  Uzzell v. Friday, D.C.N.C.1984, 592 F.Supp. 1502, 1523, the court found that there was no need for class certification and that any potential mootness of the plaintiffs' claims could be handled by allowing intervention of other interested parties.

In O'Connell v. Citrus Bowl, Inc., D.C.N.Y.1983, 99 F.R.D. 117, 126, the court denied class certification of an injunction claim noting that any injunction issued on behalf of the individual plaintiff would inure to the benefit of all so that "certification of a class solely for this claim would largely be a formality, at least for plaintiffs." The court then went on to note: "This is particularly true in a case such as this where plaintiffs have admitted that they can and will assume financial responsibility for continuing the case." (per Neaher, J.).

Rogers v. U.S. Department of Housing & Urban Devel., D.C.Cal.1982, 96 F.R.D. 149.

In an action challenging the regulations and policies of the New York Commissioner of Education with respect to the education of learning-disabled children, class certification was not necessary to avoid mooting the claims of the class consisting of school children having specific learning disabilities, in view of the fact that the determination that a particular student met the commissioner's "handicapped" standard would not moot his concern with the application of the standard to him in the future.  Riley v. Ambach, D.C.N.Y.1980, 508 F.Supp. 1222, reversed on other grounds C.A.2d, 1981, 668 F.2d 635.

An action of black citizens of the county was an inappropriate action for class certification when, if the black citizens bringing the action were successful in establishing that the sheriff and other county officials had engaged in a pattern and practice of depriving them of their federal constitutional rights, the court would so declare and grant injunctive relief, prohibiting any further such conduct, which would automatically inure to the benefit of the members of the putative class. Green v. Williams, D.C.Tenn.1980, 94 F.R.D. 238.

Eagle v. Koch, D.C.N.Y.1979, 471 F.Supp. 175.

Even if an injunction was otherwise appropriate, there was no need to certify a class under Rule 23(b)(2) for purposes of injunctive relief, when the injunction necessarily would inure to the benefit of all class members to the same extent as a class-adjudicated injunction, when the scope of the appropriate remedy best would be defined without reference to the class, and when there was no need for a class proceeding in order to ensure the admissibility of all the evidence plaintiff might seek to present.  Hernandez v. United Fire Ins. Co., D.C.Ill.1978, 79 F.R.D. 419.

A motion to certify a class was denied in an action in which three citizens of Ecuador sought a declaratory judgment and related injunction on the question whether Immigration and Naturalization Service investigators must have a reasonable suspicion that an individual is an illegal alien prior to conducting an investigatory stop, when there was substantial assurance that defendants, who were government officials, would respect an adverse determination and consider themselves bound by it with regard to their general practice and in view of the fact that the judgment would be worded to ensure that result and thereby accomplish the same effect as would class certification. Marquez v. Kiley, D.C.N.Y.1977, 436 F.Supp. 100.

A class action would not be certified when, although plaintiffs satisfied the requirements of Rule 23, certification was not necessary and would not provide a superior method of adjudicating the issues since retroactive monetary relief could not be awarded under the facts of the case and since it was clear that the prospective effects of declaratory and injunctive relief would inure to the benefit of all the requested class members. Davis v. Smith, D.C.N.Y.1977, 431 F.Supp. 1206, affirmed C.A.2d, 1978,  607 F.2d 535.

A civil-rights action brought by black men in the electrical construction trade against certain unions and the electrical contractors association would not be certified as a class action with respect to requested declaratory and injunctive relief from alleged racial discrimination, in view of the fact that any court decree directed toward the alleged discriminatory practice would afford relief to all the victims of the alleged discrimination, and not merely plaintiffs, and therefore, there existed no need for class certification with respect to that aspect of plaintiffs' suit.  Gray v. International Bhd. of Elec. Workers, D.C.D.C.1977, 73 F.R.D. 638.

When a class action is not necessary to achieve the desired relief in an employment-discrimination suit and future employees will derive no additional potential benefit by membership in any class, the "costs" of class treatment, in terms of the complexities inherent in class-action litigation and the concomitant impact on judicial efficiency and economy, are unjustified; absent a compelling reason for class treatment, the invocation of the class-action mechanism on the basis of the inclusion of future employees might well be in derogation of the increasingly important public policy promoting judicial efficiency and economy.

 Moore v. Western Pennsylvania Water Co., D.C.Pa.1977, 73 F.R.D. 450.

An action challenging the validity of a New York regulation authorizing the state to recoup aid-to-families-with-dependent-children grant overpayments from what is commonly denominated as an earned-income "disregard" would not be certified for class status since certification would add no force to the prospective effects of a declaratory judgment and could not serve to implement any meaningful retroactive relief in which the members of the class might share. McGraw v. Berger, D.C.N.Y.1976, 410 F.Supp. 1042, affirmed on other grounds C.A.2d, 1976, 537 F.2d 719, certiorari denied 97 S.Ct. 1110, 429 U.S. 1095, 51 L.Ed.2d 542.

Since the prosecution of separate actions by or against the individual members of the classes, purporting to be all homosexuals similarly situated, would not create a risk of inconsistent or varying adjudications with respect to the individual members of the class, the benefits that would justify proceeding as a class action with respect to a suit against the local commonwealth attorney and others challenging the constitutionality of the Virginia statute making sodomy a crime would be realized without resort to that procedure, and the suit would not proceed as a class action.  Doe v. Commonwealth's Attorney for City of Richmond, D.C.Va.1975, 403 F.Supp. 1199, 1200 n. 1, affirmed without opinion 1976,  96 S.Ct. 1489, 425 U.S. 901, 47 L.Ed.2d 751.

"The use of a class action is best served when initially viewed as a device to be used only in extraordinary circumstances. Fed.R.Civ.P. 23 was drafted with the recognition that only certain types of cases were amenable to a class action and that the vast majority of cases would not be amenable to a class action. Even after the threshold determination is made that a class action is an appropriate device, the inquiry should proceed to determine if, under the circumstances, it is the most appropriate device." Stuart v. Hewlett-Packard Co., D.C.Mich.1975, 66 F.R.D. 73, 77 (per Joiner, J.).

When, if plaintiffs succeeded, the relief granted would inure to the benefit of plaintiffs and all similarly situated, and the relief requested, if granted, would be identical regardless of whether the class action was maintained, no useful purpose for proceeding as a class appeared, and the motion for class status was denied.  Nelson v. Likins, D.C.Minn.1974, 389 F.Supp. 1234, affirmed per curiam C.A.8th, 1975, 510 F.2d 414.

An action for injunctive and declaratory relief to permit the distribution of the issue of the state-prison newspaper and its continued publication without interference or censorship by the state could not be maintained as a class action on behalf of outside subscribers, in that the relief applicable to an individual outside subscriber, who, contrary to defendants' motion, would not be dropped as a plaintiff, would be applicable to the entire class of subscribers.  The Luparar v. Stoneman, D.C.Vt.1974, 382 F.Supp. 495.

An action, against a vendor by a prospective purchaser who sought to purchase a house for use as a facility for the care of dependent children of all races and by a child who allegedly would have been admitted to the facility, for an equitable decree conveying the property would not be permitted to proceed as a class action, in view of the fact that the class-action aspect of the litigation was superfluous in that the purchaser, prime plaintiff, and the child could be expected to raise all the claims and defenses that the putative class would have been entitled to raise and to pursue the same remedies that the class might have pursued. du Pont v. Woodlawn Trustees, Inc., D.C.Del.1974, 64 F.R.D. 16.

7

Need found

In  Mitchell v. Johnston, C.A.5th, 1983, 701 F.2d 337, 345, the court ruled that class certification was necessary since "it would indeed be difficult for the plaintiffs to obtain the requested relief absent certification of a class action." Plaintiffs had sought declaratory and injunctive relief as well as an order requiring defendants to give notice of reinstated benefits under the medicaid program to eligible recipients who had no actual notice that the benefits in litigation had been cut back.

The denial of class status to an action in which four federal prisoners sought declaratory, injunctive and mandamus relief with regard to prison discipline, on the ground that the relief with respect to those four prisoners would inure to the benefit of present and future persons incarcerated at prison was inappropriate, in view of the fact that no declaratory relief was granted and that the judgment entered contained nothing overcoming the grievances asserted on behalf of the class.  Workman v. Mitchell, C.A.9th, 1974, 502 F.2d 1201.

The certification of the proposed class of high-school students was not precluded on the ground that class certification was not necessary because all class members would benefit from an injunction issued on behalf of the named plaintiffs even if the class was not certified, as class certification was warranted by other considerations such as mootness, suspension of the statute of limitations, notice to the class members, and an availability of evidentiary materials that otherwise might be excluded. Ollier v. Sweetwater Union High School Dist., 251 F.R.D. 564 \(S.D. Cal. 2008\).

Certification of a state-wide injunctive class of plaintiffs was appropriate in a suit challenging the city's enforcement of an unconstitutional New York statute prohibiting loitering for the purpose of begging brought on behalf of persons arrested, charged, or prosecuted under the statute, notwithstanding defendant law-enforcement agencies' objection that class certification was unnecessary because they ceased enforcement of the statute, as the end of enforcement did not moot claims for equitable relief such as the disgorgement of fines or expungement of wrongful convictions from public records; moreover, bringing non-city parties into the suit via bilateral class certification was the only way to achieve uniformity of equitable relief for past enforcement, and to effectively prevent future enforcement across the state.  Brown v. Kelly, 244 F.R.D. 222 \(S.D. N.Y. 2007\).

The effect of a favorable decision, in a Fair Housing Act action alleging denial of low-income city housing based on disability, would not necessarily protect all those similarly situated to plaintiffs, so as to render class certification unnecessary, when plaintiffs alleged that the city housing authority had knowingly engaged in a discriminatory policy for years, despite clear guidance that in so doing it was violating federal law.  Matyasovszky v. Housing Authority of City of Bridgeport, D.C.Conn.2005, 226 F.R.D. 35.

Alleged fact that stare decisis would protect subsequent plaintiffs did not compel finding that a class action was not the preferred method of adjudication, in an action by recipients of benefits under Aid to Families with Dependent Children, food stamp, and New York home-relief programs alleging denial of aid continuing; that claim overstated the protection afforded by stare decisis, particularly to indigent plaintiffs, and ignored many cases allowing class actions to seek injunctive relief against government agencies.  Morel v. Giuliani, D.C.N.Y.1995, 927 F.Supp. 622.

Homeless persons' civil-rights action against the police department would be certified as a class action, notwithstanding the department's willingness to consider itself bound with respect to all members of the class after all appeals had been exhausted; many potential class members could, in the absence of class certification, be subject to arrest or prosecution pending appeal, and the named parties might be impossible to locate in the future. Loper v. New York City Police Dep't, D.C.N.Y.1991, 135 F.R.D. 81.

Class certification was appropriate in a suit brought by nonunion employees challenging the fair-share fee arrangement authorized by statute, notwithstanding the claim that a class action was unnecessary because the action sought to declare the statute unconstitutional, and an order invalidating the arrangement effectively would grant prospective relief to all nonunion employees absent class certification; in addition to the request for equitable relief, retroactive monetary relief was sought on behalf of the nonunion employees whose wages were subject to deduction under the arrangement, and the court could not grant to unnamed employees reimbursement of monies already withheld from them, absent class certification. Hohe v. Casey, D.C.Pa.1989, 128 F.R.D. 68.

Vietnam veterans challenging Veterans' Administration's implementation of the Veteran's Dioxin and Radiation Compensation Standards Act demonstrated need for class certification, even though the veterans were seeking primarily equitable relief that would equally benefit parties and nonparties, when the veterans asked the court to void all prior benefit denials made under the VA dioxin regulation so as to allow the parties, including unidentified class members, to reapply to gain back benefits beginning from the time of their initially denied application. Nehmer v. U.S. Veterans' Administration, D.C.Cal.1987, 118 F.R.D. 113.

Class certification of past and present customers of city water works was needed to enforce final judgment in a civil-rights action against the director of the city water works, the supervisor of administrative services of the water works, and the city, alleging defendants' policies and procedures for termination of water and sewer service violated due process and equal protection, seeking declaratory and injunctive relief, as well as compensatory and punitive damages, attorney's fees and costs, even though the city adopted a new ordinance containing detailed provisions for predetermination notices and administrative hearings, when problems similar to those encountered by class representatives were still occurring, the city conceded it would take time to train personnel to administer new procedures and there was no showing that class certification was unduly burdensome to defendants. Freeman v. Hayek, D.C.Minn.1986, 635 F.Supp. 178.

If the requirements for class certification had been met, dual beneficiary under the Social Security Act and Railroad Retirement Act was entitled to class certification of an action challenging the denial of the right to retain 50% of the excess earnings, and if some further need for class certification were required, it was provided by the nonacquiescence policy of the Railroad Retirement Board and Secretary of Health and Human Services. Linquist v. Bowen, D.C.Mo.1986, 633 F.Supp. 846, affirmed on other grounds C.A.8th, 1987,  813 F.2d 884.

Certification of a class in a class action against the state and county seeking to enjoin policies and practices whereby needy and homeless families were unable to receive adequate housing was not rendered unnecessary on the ground that a declaratory judgment issued in favor of the individual plaintiff would benefit the whole class, when both the state and county defendants denied liability and the state was unlikely to act in response to a declaratory judgment. Koster v. Perales, D.C.N.Y.1985, 108 F.R.D. 46.

 Coleman v. Block, D.C.N.D.1983, 562 F.Supp. 1353 (class action needed to expand the precedential force of decision).

In Kozlowski v. Coughlin, D.C.N.Y.1982, 539 F.Supp. 852, 855, the court certified a class of all present prison inmates and their visitors in an action challenging the constitutionality of a statewide regulation pertaining to an inmate visitation program at the state correctional facilities, stating: “(w)hile defendants contend that class certification is unnecessary because a judgment in favor of the individual plaintiffs would run to the benefit of those similarly situated to plaintiffs, we find certification in this case ‘advisable to cautiously safeguard the interests of the entire class by ensuring that any order runs to the class as a whole.’”

Certification of a class composed of all persons within New York State who had or would have in the future a “fair hearing” request pending on issues relating to the operation of either the aid to families of dependent children or the medical-assistance programs was appropriate in an action brought by the recipient of benefits under those programs. Bizjak v. Blum, D.C.N.Y.1980, 490 F.Supp. 1297.

In cases involving sensitive and highly personal matters, such as abortion cases, the reasons for certifying a class become more cogent; further anonymity can be guaranteed in a class action, as the chilling effect of publicly airing so private a matter as the decision to terminate a pregnancy may well preclude a woman from seeking vindication of her constitutional rights in a federal court and, furthermore, it may be that a class could be assembled whose fluid membership always could include some women with viable claims thereby guaranteeing a case or controversy and pretermitted mootness. Bossier City Medical Suite, Inc. v. City of Bossier City, D.C.La.1980, 483 F.Supp. 633.

In an action brought against the United States and public officers of the United States by a religious organization which alleged that it was the subject of a government-wide conspiracy to destroy religion, the proposed class would be conditionally certified for purposes of the injunctive relief sought, in view of the fact that treating the action as a class action would prevent any party from withholding discovery material on the basis that it related to an entity not included in the class and in view of the fact that the class action probably would make it easier for members of the class to enforce an injunction in the future should one be issued.  Founding Church of Scientology of Washington, D.C., Inc. v. Director, FBI, D.C.D.C.1978, 459 F.Supp. 748.

When the case involved issues of whether there was in fact a conflict between HUD authorized rents and rents authorized by the state board authorized to administer the rent-control law and whether pass-through riders in leases were valid, the class-action method appeared to be superior for handling an action brought by tenants of a middle income development financed by mortgages endorsed and guaranteed by HUD, seeking a declaratory judgment that HUD's order preempting local rent-control laws was void and seeking to enjoin the landlords from collecting increased rents approved by HUD.  Argo v. Hills, D.C.N.Y.1977, 425 F.Supp. 151, affirmed without opinion C.A.2d, 1978, 578 F.2d 1366.

In Rutherglen, Notice, Scope, and Preclusion in Title VII Class Action, 1983, 69 Va.L.Rev. 11, the author argues that it is inappropriate for a court to go forward without certifying a Title VII action as in all but a few cases treatment of the case as a class action serves important purposes and the justification for issuing class-wide injunctions in individual actions no longer exists.

In Wilton, The Class Action in Social Reform Litigation: In Whose Interest?, 1983, 63 B.U.L.Rev. 597, the author argues that it usually is in the interest of the defendant in social reform litigation to have a class certified, whereas the plaintiffs usually can best be served by an individual suit. Further, because the avoidance of multiple lawsuits serves the interests of the judicial system, as well as the defendant, there is a need for class certification so that the court should certify the action sua sponte if neither party so moves.

8

Mootness

Mootness as applied in class actions is discussed in § 1785.1.

9

Mootness risk

The district court abused its discretion in denying class certification because it failed to consider the risk of mootness in the litigation, which came about when the named plaintiff attained his majority and he no longer had a personal stake in the challenge to the curfew ordinance.  Johnson v. Opelousas, C.A.5th, 1981, 658 F.2d 1065.

In a suit brought against the state and county officials of the New York State Department of Social Services, seeking to enjoin them from continuing to deny a class of so-called “medically needy” persons the same deductions for work expenses in calculating net income as are permitted to applicants for aid to families with dependent children, the district court did not abuse its discretion in certifying plaintiffs' class, since only class certification could avert the substantial possibility of the litigation becoming moot prior to decision. Greklek v. Toia, C.A.2d, 1977, 565 F.2d 1259, certiorari denied 98 S.Ct. 3081, 436 U.S. 962, 57 L.Ed.2d 1128.

Hoehle v. Likins, C.A.8th, 1976, 538 F.2d 229.

 Kapps v. Wing, D.C.N.Y.2003, 283 F.Supp.2d 866.

Court would certify a proposed class consisting of all New York State children with psychiatric disabilities who had been or would be found by the Commissioner of the New York State Department of Health and the Commissioner of the New York State Office of Mental Health to be appropriate for placement in a residential-treatment facility, and who had not been or would not be provided with that placement with reasonable promptness; for the past few years, the waiting list had contained an average of 200 children, and since all of the named plaintiffs already had been provided placements, the action would become moot without class certification.  Alexander A. v. Novello, D.C.N.Y.2002, 210 F.R.D. 27.

Certification of a class in city residents' action challenging the state and city administration of food stamp and Medicaid programs was not a mere formality, even if the required relief requiring changes in the city's policies and procedures would benefit all proposed members regardless of their inclusion, when the action would otherwise be in danger of becoming moot before final adjudication. Reynolds v. Giuliani, D.C.N.Y.2000, 118 F.Supp.2d 352.

The fluidity of a proposed class and the resulting likelihood of mootness for the claims of the named representatives rendered class certification necessary in an action by incapacitated criminal defendants alleging improper release of confidential information by state psychiatric-hospital officials and seeking an injunction, even though the defendant officials had promised to treat all patients identically based on the outcome of the suit. Hirschfeld v. Stone, D.C.N.Y.2000, 193 F.R.D. 175.

Certification of a class of students challenging the university's policy concerning accommodation of learning disabilities was appropriate even though there was no strict necessity for plaintiffs to proceed as a class in order to obtain the requested injunctive and declaratory relief, in light of the danger of mootness from students graduating, otherwise leaving the university, or growing disinterested.  Guckenberger v. Boston Univ., D.C.Mass.1997, 957 F.Supp. 306.

Certification of a class seeking equitable relief is particularly appropriate when the case is one in which the named class representative's claims have or will become moot as the litigation progresses.  Kutschbach v. Davies, D.C.Ohio 1995, 885 F.Supp. 1079.

 McNeill v. New York City Housing Authority, D.C.N.Y.1989, 719 F.Supp. 233.

 Follette v. Vitanza, D.C.N.Y.1987, 658 F.Supp. 492, 506.

Cottrell v. Lopeman, D.C.Ohio 1987, 119 F.R.D. 651.

Cristiano v. Courts of the Justices of Peace in & for New Castle County, D.C.Del.1987, 115 F.R.D. 240.

 Alston v. Coughlin, D.C.N.Y.1986, 109 F.R.D. 609.

Koster v. Perales, D.C.N.Y.1985, 108 F.R.D. 46.

 Perez-Funez v. District Director, Immigration & Naturalization Serv., D.C.Cal.1984, 611 F.Supp. 990.

McCoy v. Ithaca Housing Authority, D.C.N.Y.1983, 559 F.Supp. 1351.

 RAM v. Blum, D.C.N.Y.1982, 533 F.Supp. 933.

 Calkins v. Blum, D.C.N.Y.1981, 511 F.Supp. 1073, 1089.

Jamroz v. Blum, D.C.N.Y.1981, 509 F.Supp. 953 (potential problems of enforcement and mootness support class certification).

Arceneaux v. Edwards, D.C.La.1980, 516 F.Supp. 795.

Class certification of an action challenging the constitutionality of the New York statutory scheme for the provision of child-care services was not to be denied on the ground that the defendants as reputable government officials and child-care agency officials would act prospectively toward all children according to the court's final judgment, especially absent an indication that the challenged policy was to be withdrawn, and, in any event, considerations of judicial economy justified class treatment to avoid the likelihood of mootness before a final resolution of the merits, irrespective of the character of the defendants.  Wilder v. Bernstein, D.C.N.Y.1980, 499 F.Supp. 980.

The class action is especially appropriate when the claims of the members of the class may become moot as the case progresses. Adams v. Califano, D.C.Md.1979, 474 F.Supp. 974, affirmed without opinion C.A.4th, 1979, 609 F.2d 505, affirmed on the merits  C.A.4th, 1981, 643 F.2d 995.

Since class-action status may afford class members protection against the risk of mootness of the named plaintiffs' claim, and may facilitate enforcement of a favorable judgment when defendant fails to comply with the court order, class certification is not an empty formality even in a case in which declaratory and injunctive relief would automatically inure to the benefit of those similarly situated. Westcott v. Califano, D.C.Mass.1978, 460 F.Supp. 737, affirmed 1979,  99 S.Ct. 2655, 443 U.S. 76, 61 L.Ed.2d 382.

Although defendants, public officials charged with the administration of the program for aid to needy families with children, would abide by the court's decision in an action seeking benefits under the program free from conditions imposed by the "Burlington Project," state job-search program, when the duration of the "Burlington Project" was limited to the time period between the application for benefits and the eligibility determination so that the claims could be mooted by the successful completion of the Project, class certification was necessary to preserve the claims for others similarly situated, requiring the action be maintained as a class action on behalf of persons who are or would be applicants for ANFC benefits and subject to the requirements of the "Burlington Project" and persons who had applied for but denied ANFC benefits for failure to meet the requirements of the Project. Armstrong v. Candon, D.C.Vt.1978, 451 F.Supp. 1148.

In a challenge to state parole procedures, considerations of judicial economy justified class treatment to avoid mootness before a final resolution of the merits caused by a change in the status of the named plaintiffs.  Cicero v. Olgiati, D.C.N.Y.1976, 410 F.Supp. 1080.

Class certification was not unnecessary on the basis that the judgment would run to the benefit of all those situated similarly to plaintiffs, when it seemed advisable to safeguard cautiously the interests of the entire class by ensuring that any order ran to the class as a whole and that class certification would also help to avoid any future problem of mootness. Mendoza v. Lavine, D.C.N.Y.1976, 72 F.R.D. 520.

Monetary relief involved

Class certification was appropriate for challenge to food stamps disqualification procedures in light of presence of over 500 claimants with a similar challenge, when, absent certification, each putative class member would have to bring a separate action to protect the right to restoration of wrongfully withheld

 Curtis v. Commissioner, Maine Dep't of Human Servs., D.C.Me.1994, 159 F.R.D. 339.

 Gelb v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., D.C.N.Y.1993, 150 F.R.D. 76, 79, citing Wright, Miller & Kane.

Copeland v. Perales, D.C.N.Y.1992, 141 F.R.D. 11.

 Luyando v. Bowen, D.C.N.Y.1989, 124 F.R.D. 52.

 Pension Benefit Guar. Corp. v. LTV Corporation, D.C.N.Y.1988, 122 F.R.D. 436.

When an action brought by pensioners challenging federal and state provisions that required that certain pensions be offset dollar-for-dollar against unemployment-insurance benefits for which the pensioner would otherwise be eligible met normal prerequisites for a class action, and the pensioners sought not only declaratory and injunctive relief, but also sought ancillary monetary relief for each of the members of the class, class certification would not be denied on the theory that no useful purpose would be served by granting class certification.  Rivera v. Patino, D.C.Cal.1981, 524 F.Supp. 136.

 Calkins v. Blum, D.C.N.Y.1981, 511 F.Supp. 1073, 1089.

No certification because monetary relief not involved

 Davis v. Smith, C.A.2d, 1978, 607 F.2d 535.

When retroactive monetary relief is not at issue, and the prospective benefits of declaratory and injunctive relief will benefit all members of a proposed class to such an extent that certification of a class would not further the implementation of the judgment, a district court may decline certification. Markel v. Blum, D.C.N.Y.1981, 509 F.Supp. 942.

 Rush v. Smith, D.C.N.Y.1977, 437 F.Supp. 576.

McGraw v. Berger, D.C.N.Y.1976, 410 F.Supp. 1042, affirmed on the merits C.A.2d, 1976, 537 F.2d 719, certiorari denied 97 S.Ct. 1110, 429 U.S. 1095, 51 L.Ed.2d 542.

11

Attorney-fee awards

Attorney-fee awards in class suits are discussed in § 1803 to 1803.1.

12

Later certification allowed

Although the court in Bizjak v. Blum, D.C.N.Y.1980, 490 F.Supp. 1297, noted that class certification is not mandatory in cases seeking only prospective relief, it approved class certification in a case challenging state imposed case-record access restrictions in fair hearings involving federal aid to families with dependent children and the medical-assistance programs because of the defendant's history of noncompliance with state-court decisions on this question and the defendant's refusal to assure that she would not continue to enforce the restrictions in the face of an individual determination.

Kilfoyle v. Heyison, D.C.Pa.1976, 417 F.Supp. 239, 243.

13

Compliance assured

Although the complaint originally had sought to maintain the action on behalf of “all persons in the State of Vermont who have had their license (sic) suspended for failure to pay a Vermont Motor Vehicle Purchase and Use Tax,” it later was stipulated that plaintiff would withdraw the class allegations, that the Commissioner would extend to all persons similarly situated the same relief as the court might decree in plaintiff’s favor, and that the Commissioner would not object to an order directing him to restore the driving licenses of plaintiff and all intervenors whose driver’s licenses had been suspended for the same reason (whose intervention the Commissioner would not oppose) until further order of the court.  Wells v. Malloy, C.A.2d, 1975, 510 F.2d 74.

Class certification was not warranted in an action by plaintiffs seeking relief concerning New York’s scheme for funding summer-education programs for handicapped children who required 12-month schooling when there was no showing that compliance with the court's mandate would not be afforded, if plaintiffs eventually prevailed on the merits of the claim. Stanton v. Board of Educ. of Norwich Cent. School Dist., D.C.N.Y.1983, 581 F.Supp. 190.

Certification of plaintiffs as a class can be denied when defendants who are government officials or entities affirmatively have declared their intention to be bound in their treatment of all putative class members by a decision in favor of the named plaintiffs; when those defendants have not represented that intent on the record, class certification is appropriate to guarantee that a decision in favor of the named plaintiffs will benefit all class members.  Rios v. Marshall, D.C.N.Y.1983, 100 F.R.D. 395.

When it appeared that the decree to be entered in favor of plaintiffs and adverse to the welfare officials would be respected not only for plaintiffs but for those similarly situated, the motion for class certification was denied.  Ruiz v. Blum, D.C.N.Y.1982, 549 F.Supp. 871.

Class certification of a proposed plaintiff class of medicaid recipients in an action challenging the program under which medicaid recipients deemed to have overused the services of doctors and pharmacies were restricted to a single primary provider would be denied when the individual plaintiffs, although asking for monetary relief for the named representatives, did not seem to be requesting damages for the class but rather appeared to seek only declaratory and injunctive relief, and defendant governmental employees had expressed their commitment to applying any court-ordered relief to all medicaid recipients similarly situated.  Denenberg v. Blum, D.C.N.Y.1982, 93 F.R.D. 131.

When defendants in an action challenging the visitors rule at a state-funded housing project which required the tenants to obtain the management's permission before entertaining overnight guests and to register guests with the manager's office stated that any order issued by the court would be applied equally to all tenants, certification of the suit as a class action on behalf of all tenants who reside or will reside in the housing project was denied. McKenna v. Peekskill Housing Authority, D.C.N.Y.1979, 83 F.R.D. 600.

14

Compliance not assured

Class action could be brought alleging that the rights of African-American and Latino teachers under Title VII and state laws were violated through the imposition of a requirement that they pass a test to receive or retain a teaching license, despite the claim that the class action was unnecessary as the government would automatically extend the benefits of any injunctive or declaratory relief obtained by a single claimant to all members of the putative class, when "Defendants here have offered no assurances that they would grant individual relief based upon the ruling in a single action. To the contrary, defendants have argued that the class definition is amorphous and overbroad. Thus, defendants are not committed to according all members of the proposed class relief based upon a single action."  Gulino v. Board of Educ. of City School Dist. of City of New York, D.C.N.Y.2001, 201 F.R.D. 326, 334 (per Motley, J.).

Alleged fact that any relief accorded named plaintiffs would be incorporated by state and city agencies into uniform regulations did not compel finding that a class action was unnecessary, in an action by recipients of benefits under Aid to Families with Dependent Children, food stamp, and New York home-relief programs alleging denial of timely aid continuing; that assertion neglected the historical reluctance of the city agency to provide class-relief in similar cases.  Morel v. Giuliani, D.C.N.Y.1995, 927 F.Supp. 622.

Courts declining to certify a class, on the ground that retroactive monetary relief is not at issue and that prospective benefits of declaratory and injunctive relief will benefit all members of the proposed class, do not merely assume that defendants will comply with the terms of injunction on a class-wide basis. Catanzano v. Dowling, D.C.N.Y.1994, 847 F.Supp. 1070.

Stare decisis is especially inappropriate as a ground for denying class certification when defendants have not indicated whether they will abide by the court's decision should that court decide in favor of nonclass plaintiffs.  Brown v. Giuliani, D.C.N.Y.1994, 158 F.R.D. 251.

 Cutler v. Perales, D.C.N.Y.1989, 128 F.R.D. 39.

Plaintiff class would be certified when, although defendant assured the court that it would apply uniformly statewide any judgment, defendant refused to commit to sending notice of relief to all class members on a statewide basis. McCoy v. Ithaca Housing Authority, D.C.N.Y.1983, 559 F.Supp. 1351.

 Ram v. Blum, D.C.N.Y.1982, 533 F.Supp. 933.

 Percey v. Blum, D.C.N.Y.1981, 524 F.Supp. 324.

 Calkins v. Blum, D.C.N.Y.1981, 511 F.Supp. 1073, 1090.

Markel v. Blum, D.C.N.Y.1981, 509 F.Supp. 942.

Class certification of an action challenging the constitutionality of the New York statutory scheme for the provision of child-care services was not to be denied on the ground that defendants as reputable government officials and child-care officials would act prospectively toward all children according to the court's final judgment, especially absent an indication that the challenged policy was to be withdrawn.

 Wilder v. Bernstein, D.C.N.Y.1980, 499 F.Supp. 980.

Class-action certification was not required to be denied as regards an action challenging the proposed reduction of food-stamp allowances on the ground that governmental functions were involved when the defendant commissioner of the county department of social services had not conceded that an identity of issues existed with respect to all potential class members. Willis v. Lascaris, D.C.N.Y.1980, 499 F.Supp. 749, 754 n. 9.

Bizjak v. Blum, D.C.N.Y.1980, 490 F.Supp. 1297.

Class-action treatment was not unnecessary, despite defendants' contention that a declaration that the statute challenged was unconstitutional and the order enjoining its enforcement would inure to the benefit of the putative class, when defendants argued that plaintiff's claim did not present legal and/or factual issues identical to the claims of the putative class, there was no affirmative commitment of defendants to apply uniformly any resulting judgment, and there was reason to believe that principles of stare decisis would be unavailing to ensure classwide relief absent certification.  Laurido v. Simon, D.C.N.Y.1980, 489 F.Supp. 1169.

When a proposed class of plaintiffs was temporary detainees, and the claims of the named plaintiffs would likely become moot before the determination of their claims concerning the conditions of the confinement, but new detainees would be subjected to the same alleged deprivations, class certification was necessary to preserve the claim, in view of the fact that the state defendants had not come forward and affirmatively represented that they would abide by a decision in favor of plaintiffs with respect to members of the class or any future detainees. Lucas v. Wasser, D.C.N.Y.1976, 73 F.R.D. 361.

But compare

"In a case such as this one, where a state statute has been declared unconstitutional and the enforcement of the statute has been enjoined, there is little practical difference between a judgment in favor of individual defendants and a judgment in favor of a proposed class they seek to represent. At conference, the attorney for the State of Louisiana assured the court that the provisions of the act found unconstitutional will not be enforced pending appeal, and that the Attorney General would advise local officials not to enforce the provisions at issue pending a final determination of their constitutionality on appeal. Thus, the State argues that it is unnecessary and indeed would serve no useful purpose to certify a class. However, plaintiffs point out that theoretically the Court's judgment runs only in favor of the named plaintiffs. There are also problems that possibly could arise in the future as to mootness or standing if a class is not certified." Arceneaux v. Edwards, D.C.La.1980, 516 F.Supp. 795, 805 (per Duplantier, J.).

15

Judgment scope explicit

 Laurido v. Simon, D.C.N.Y.1980, 489 F.Supp. 1169, 1174.

“Defendants point out that the City may be relied upon to obey any final decree in this case, suggesting that it is therefore unnecessary to hold the action to be on behalf of a class. The same may be said, however, in the great bulk of cases for which subdivision (b)(2) of Rule 23 was written. The least that can be said on the other side is that the rule plainly applies, that there is no discernible prejudice to defendants in applying it, and that plaintiffs are entitled to have the full scope of their decree made explicit and unmistakable.” Rodriguez v. Percell, D.C.N.Y.1975, 391 F.Supp. 38, 41 n. 2.

End of Document

© 2023 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF DELAWARE

EMPLOYERS INSURANCE COMPANY OF WAUSAU, HELMSMAN MANAGEMENT SERVICES, LLC, LIBERTY INSURANCE CORPORATION, LIBERTY MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, LM INSURANCE CORPORATION, THE FIRST LIBERTY INSURANCE CORPORATION, and WAUSAU UNDERWRITERS INSURANCE COMPANY,

Defendants-Below,
Appellants/Cross-Appellees,

v.

FIRST STATE ORTHOPAEDICS, P.A., on behalf of itself and all others similarly situated,

Plaintiff-Below, Appellee/Cross-Appellant.

[PROPOSED] ORDER GRANTING MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE AMICI CURIAE BRIEF SUPPORTING CROSS-APPELLEES AND AFFIRMANCE OF DENIAL OF CLASS CERTIFICATION

The Court, having read and considered the Motion for Leave to File Amici Curiae Brief filed by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America (the “Chamber”) and the Delaware State Chamber of Commerce (the “Delaware Chamber”) (collectively, “Movants”), and all other pertinent filings submitted, and finding good cause therefore, hereby ORDERS that Movants’ Motion is GRANTED. The Amici Curiae Brief, submitted concurrently with the Motion, is hereby deemed filed.

No. 27, 2023

Appeal from the Superior Court of the State of Delaware,
C.A. No. S19C-01-051 CAK

SO ORDERED this _____ day of _____, 2023.

Justice, Delaware Supreme Court

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF DELAWARE

EMPLOYERS INSURANCE COMPANY OF WAUSAU, HELMSMAN MANAGEMENT SERVICES, LLC, LIBERTY INSURANCE CORPORATION, LIBERTY MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, LM INSURANCE CORPORATION, THE FIRST LIBERTY INSURANCE CORPORATION, and WAUSAU UNDERWRITERS INSURANCE COMPANY,

Defendants-Below,
Appellants/Cross-Appellees,

v.

FIRST STATE ORTHOPAEDICS, P.A., on behalf of itself and all others similarly situated,

Plaintiff-Below, Appellee/Cross-Appellant.

No. 27, 2023

Appeal from the Superior Court of the State of Delaware,
C.A. No. S19C-01-051 CAK

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I, Richard L. Renck, hereby certify that on July 12, 2023, the foregoing document was served via electronic mail (e-mail) and via File&ServeXpress upon the counsel of record:

Kevin J. Connors, Esquire
Marshall Dennehey Warner Coleman & Coggin
Nemours Building
1007 N. Orange Street, Suite 600
P.O. Box 8888
Wilmington, DE 19899
kjconnors@mdwcg.com

Tiffany Powers, Esquire
Andrew Hatchett, Esquire
Alston & Bird, LLP
1201 West Peachtree Street
Atlanta, GA 30309
tiffany.powers@alston.com
andrew.hatchett@alston.com

Jonathan L. Parshall, Esquire
Lauren A. Cirrinicione, Esquire
Murphy & Landon
1011 Centre Road, Suite 210
Wilmington, DE 19805
jonp@msllaw.com
lcirrinicione@msllaw.com

John S. Spadaro, Esquire
1011 Centre Road, Suite 210
Wilmington, DE 19805
johnsspadaro@gmail.com

[SIGNATURE PAGE FOLLOWS.]

Dated: July 12, 2023

DUANE MORRIS LLP

/s/ Richard L. Renck

Richard L. Renck (#3893)
1201 N. Market Street, Suite 501
Wilmington, DE 19801
Telephone: (302) 657-4900
Facsimile: (302) 657-4901
RLRenck@duanemorris.com

*Counsel for Movants the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of
America of the Delaware State
Chamber of Commerce*